House of Representatives who serve on the Ways and Means Committee and who have given long study not merely to excise taxes but to the question of raising additional revenue or raising revenue generally? To attempt to repeal all excise taxes on this bill is obviously unfair; it is obviously unwise; and it will defeat the purpose of those who have offered, and I assume in good faith, to eliminate in whole or in part the wartime excise taxes.

Frankly I think they should be eliminated, or drastically reduced if they cannot be eliminated entirely. But this bill deals not with wartime excise taxes but with the oleomargarine tax, which has been imposed, at one rate or another, for 60-odd years. It is not a wartime tax in any event.

In the second place, the most burdensome part of this tax lies in the fact that it is not so much an excise tax, but is an occupation tax; it is a license on the manufacturer, the wholesaler, the retailer of oleomargarine. Therefore, Mr. President, the amendment seeking to modify or repeal the wartime excise taxes should not be placed on this bill.

Mr. President, I express the hope that the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] will prevail, and that the provisions dealing with the wartime excise taxes will be stricken from the bill. I warn the Senate and the country that if that is not done, probably there will be no legislation upon excise taxes at this session of the Congress. Not only do I think the wartime excise taxes should be repealed or modified, but I think action should be taken quickly in order to prevent what now is taking place, namely, some stagnation in the sale and merchandising of the articles on which the excise taxes are imposed.

But if we follow this course, it may result in defeating the effort to repeal the oleomargarine tax; and it undoubtedly will, I think, result in defeating any effort to deal with excise taxes at this session of the Congress, because the House committee would certainly raise an issue, and we would be confronted with a condition which we could not overcome.

Mr. President, I wish to say one word about the Wiley substitute. It has been blandly accepted here that it is entirely constitutional. I seriously doubt it. Undoubtedly it is true that the interstate and foreign commerce clause of the Constitution must be construed in connection with other related and pertinent provisions of the Constitution. In other words, the interstate and foreign commerce clause cannot ignore the fifth amendment, the due process guaranteed in the fifth amendment to the Constitution; and therefore it has always been held, in all the rightly and well-considered cases, that there must be some reasonable relationship between the prohibition or regulation imposed and the legitimate control or regulation of commerce.

Mr. President, what is the Wiley substitute? It does not outlaw oleomargarine. On the contrary, it merely outlaws a particular tint or color of oleomargarine. On the contrary, it recognizes the right to manufacture, ship, sell, and use oleomargarine in any form except when it has a particular tint of yellow. Not only that, Mr. President, but not a word is said here with respect to the particular tint of yellow which is described in the substitute amendment as being deceptive. It is said that oleo so colored is in competition with butter and that the competition is unfair because someone is deceived. Who is deceived, Mr. President? The most illiterate purchaser in my State and, I dare say, the most illiterate buyer of oleomargarine in any State, knows he is buying oleomargarine. The idea of the public's being deceived is so transparently baseless that I do not think it warrants discussion. Deceive, indeed. When shipped in interstate commerce, the color is not even disclosed. When shipped in interstate commerce, it bears the labeling required under both Federal and, in many instances, State regulations of food, and drugs, and cosmetics. When shipped in interstate commerce, no one knows the color or sees the color. What reasonable relationship is there between an outright prohibition or denial of the right of a particular tint of yellow oleomargarine—none other—to move in interstate commerce and the prevention of deception in interstate commerce, when the color is not even disclosed in that movement or is not even visible while the article is moving in interstate commerce?

We know that oleomargarine is transported in packages; we know that the packages carry labels and an analysis. It is not in any sense a matter that is related—not even remotely related, in my judgment—to the regulation of commerce.

There must be borne in mind—and I wish to state this as the premise upon which I am making this statement—the origin and history of the commerce clause of the Constitution, and the primary purpose it was intended to serve, to wit, to make freer and easier commerce between the States, to permit things to move in interstate commerce, if you please, notwithstanding that one State, because of special interests in the State, might desire to prevent it. Not only because of its historic background and not only because of the consistent application of the commerce clause for a full century after the approval of the Constitution, but because of the fact that the prohibition of a particular tint of yellow oleomargarine bears no reasonable relationship to any legitimate regulation of commerce in margarine, beyond all doubt we cannot ignore the fifth amendment, which guarantees due process, in the application of the interstate and foreign-commerce clause of the Constitution.

Indeed, Mr. President, the Supreme Court itself has specifically said that the interstate and foreign commerce clause of the Constitution must be construed in the light of the fifth amendment, which guarantees due process.

But it is said that the filled milk case fits this case like a glove. Mr. President, the filled milk case is not a closely reasoned case, as I analyze it. But what did the filled milk bill do? Let us glance at it for a moment.

That bill passed the Senate a little while after I came here. I was ashamed of it; I was ashamed that United States Senators would, after so long a time, merely to protect one particular food product, outlaw another legitimate food product. However, the Congress did so. But it said this in the act—and I read now from section 2 of the Filled Milk Act:

> It is hereby declared that filled milk, as herein defined, is an adulterated article of food, injurious to the public health, and its sale constitutes a fraud upon the public. It shall be unlawful for any person to manufacture, within any Territory or possession, or within the District of Columbia, or to ship or deliver for shipment in interstate or foreign commerce, any filled milk.

It is true, Mr. President, that at the trial of that particular case evidence was offered for the purpose of showing that filled milk, as then prepared or made, was not an adulterated food and was not injurious to the public health. But that evidence was rejected. The court then proceeded to say that because the public might be confused because of the second leg upon which the filled-milk bill originally stood, they would hold the act constitutional. That is true. I can see how the decision was made, although I think the reasoning is not too clear. It was an act which in the first place outlawed something. In the second place, it was an act which said filled milk was an adulterated food; and in the third place, it said it was a fraud.

What does the Wiley amendment say? Does it say oleomargarine is a fraud? Not at all. Does it say it is an adulterated food? Does it say it is injurious to the public health? Not at all. It says that a particular tint of yellow oleomargarine is outlawed; that is to say, it cannot be shipped at all in interstate commerce. In order to prevent the shipment of a particular tint of oleomargarine, the Senate is asked to do the most drastic thing the Congress has ever been called upon to do—namely, to prohibit entirely the shipment in interstate commerce of this particular tint of yellow oleomargarine. White oleomargarine can be shipped. Oleomargarine of any color except this particular tint of yellow can be shipped. Is Congress to say that? Is Congress to turn completely around and begin to put up the bars against the product of one State as against another? I beg Senators not to do it. Coming from a State which has felt several times the effect of certain class legislation, similar to that here proposed, I beg Senators not to do it. It would reverse the current of history if it were undertaken to be done. I think it most doubtful that the Supreme Court, under this amendment, would say the act was constitutional, even if it were passed. Why do Senators want it passed? In the bill which the Finance Committee sent to the Senate floor we were most careful to preserve and protect all the States. Rewriting the House language upon that point, we said:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the possession, sale, or serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in any State or Territory in contravention of the laws of such State or Territory.

That constitutes protection to the States. There are 32 States which now legalize the sale of oleomargarine. There are manufacturing plants in only 17 of them. Under the Wiley substitute, the 15 of the 32 States having no manufacturing plants within their borders would be denied the right to have a pure-food product shipped into their borders. I wonder what the sponsors of the amendment are thinking about. I wonder why the newspapers have not been more severe. I wonder upon what basis we can justify legislation of this kind, except upon the frank declaration that we want to protect a particular food product, desirable as that product is, necessary as that product is, against another food product which is nutritious, palatable, and not assailed here as being impure, and upon the pretense, as I have said, that only a particular tint of a particular food product is to be denied the right to enter interstate commerce. If the Supreme Court looks at the case, in the event the amendment is adopted and becomes a part of the law, the court may say it is not even remotely related to the underlying reason upon which the Filled Milk case was decided, and upon which many other cases, for that matter, were decided, sustaining both Federal and State statutes.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope, in the first place, that the provision to repeal all excise taxes will be stricken from the bill. I express that hope in the interest of obtaining some legislation at this session upon excise taxes. I also hope the substitute amendment will be defeated when the vote comes upon it.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON].

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I have on the desk an amendment to the so-called Gillette-Wiley amendment. Is it in order now to call up the amendment, which in effect strikes out a portion of the Wiley amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has not offered the amendment actually. He has had it printed, and it is lying on the table.

Mr. MAGNUSON. At this time I offer the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If no further amendment is in order to the substitute, the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment in the nature of a substitute by striking out section 4, beginning on page 5, line 3, through line 20, page 6.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, all the amendment seeks to do is to strike from the Wiley-Gillette amendment the portion of the amendment which would repeal or modify the excise taxes, and that action is sought for the very able and cogent reasons stated by the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE]. I hope Senators interested in the repeal of the tax on oleomargarine—to which I am opposed—will not support the portion of the amendment which would modify the excise taxes.

We have heard an able discussion of this question by the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia. The Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate are giving consideration to the repeal or modification of the excise taxes. The subject does not belong in the pending bill, and, although I favor the modification of the excise taxes and also favor the Wiley amendment, I still think we should not have the tax repeal amendment made a part of the bill. I hope the Senate will so vote.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the junior Senator from Minnesota.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in the latter part of last week, it was my privilege to speak in support of the Gillette-Wiley substitute. At that time I emphasized that the bill which comes from the committee is not a bill in the interest of the American consumer. I recognize that one of the principal arguments propounded by sponsors of the oleo legislation is, that by the removal of excise and other taxes on oleo, along with restrictions on color, the American consumer will be provided with a palatable, nutritious spread at much reduced cost. So, Mr. President, I wish to offer for the RECORD, and have included as a portion of my remarks, a survey which has been released by the American Butter Institute of Chicago. This survey was made by the merchandising division of the Reuben H. Donnelley Corp., nationally known and independent market research analysts. The survey brings to our attention some facts which need to be well studied before we take a vote on this important issue.

The substance of the survey is simply that, where we have uncolored oleo, the price per pound in the major cities of the United States ranges from 18 to 22 or 23 cents a pound; but where we have the colored oleo, which colored oleo should by the nature of the tax, increase the price about 10 cents a pound, thereby having an average price range of from 28 to 30 cents, we find that the price ranges from a high of 55 cents a pound to a low of 40 cents a pound. There is, in other words, by the mere fact of the addition of a small amount of color a price differential, which averages 23½ cents.

I bring this to the attention of the Senate, because the argument which has been placed before the American housewife and the American consumer is that the removal of all restrictions on the oleo product will mean a great reduction in the cost of living. The facts of price differential between uncolored and colored oleo reveal, however, that the price increase bears no relationship to the amount of the tax. In fact, colored oleo seems to provide a means of jacking up the prices to as high a point as the market will bear. The fact is, that profiteering takes place when we have colored oleomargarine as compared with uncolored oleomargarine.

Mr. President, I ask that the table which I send to the desk, and the remarks pertaining thereto, be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table, with the accompanying remarks, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRICE SPREADS—WHITE AND COLORED OLEO
(DECEMBER 27–30, 1949)

The following figures show the price spreads between yellow oleomargarine and white oleomargarine in 25 supermarkets in each of six cities, December 27–30, 1949. The figures represent posted prices in the several stores as reported and certified to the American Butter Institute, Chicago, by the merchandising division of the Reuben H. Donnelley Corp., nationally known and independent market research analysts. The figures do not include small independent stores where merchandising costs are presumably not as low as in supermarkets. Prices in some independent stores are reported to be higher than those submitted herewith:

	Yellow oleo	Uncolored oleo	Difference between colored and uncolored
	Cents per pound	Cents per pound	Cents per pound
Fort Worth	49	19.0	30.0
Indianapolis	49	13.0	36.0
Louisville	45	18.0	27.0
Kansas City	45	17.0	28.0
Little Rock	45	17.5	27.5
San Francisco	43	21.0	22.0
Average	46	17.6	28.4

Average difference in price of colored and uncolored oleo, 28.4 cents per pound—almost 3 times the Federal taxes and license fees on yellow oleomargarine.

MEMORANDUM ON SURVEY

1. The difference of price in each city and the average difference for the six cities reflects the lowest and highest retail price for the two types of oleomargarine—colored and uncolored. It will be contended that the average comparison as stated above is not fair because similar brands of colored and uncolored oleomargarine were not taken to make such a comparison. However, it must be remembered that oleo is the same product throughout the country, with its ingredients being controlled by the standards of identity or definition promulgated by the Food and Drug Administration of the Federal Security Agency. Oleomargarine must contain 80 percent fat with other ingredients being water, emulsifier, artificial flavoring, salt, and chemical preservatives, etc.

2. A study of the prices of oleomargarine in the six cities showed an extreme variation among the colored spreads and the uncolored varieties, respectively, with prices varying up to 100 percent. However, prices of creamery butter, checked in the same 150 supermarkets, show only a 10 to 15 percent spread in any city and are relatively the same price in the various cities.

3. The average price of cottonseed and soybean crude oils for January delivery reported in the New York Journal of Commerce January 10, was 11 cents per pound. Each pound of oleomargarine contains only 0.8 of a pound of fat and, thus, the cost of the fat ingredient for each pound of oleo is only 8.8 cents. The other ingredients in a pound of oleo would not exceed 1 to 1½ cents. Add to this the labor involved and processing costs, and the six-city survey reliably proves that the retail price per pound of oleo results in a most liberal spread between the price of the raw ingredients, or farmers' share, and the price paid by the consumer.

4. Senator FULBRIGHT, of Arkansas, on January 4, introduced a survey which was the result of a questionnaire he had sent to several thousand grocers. Based on the replies they gave to the Senator's question, the average spread between white and yellow oleomargarine was only 10.8 cents per pound. It can be left to your own imagination as to whether the findings reported by trained, professional shoppers and investigators are more reliable than those uncovered by a mail questionnaire survey. It is an old saying in opinion research that the mail survey process shows only the "yes" vote. Those people who have time to fill in questionnaires, and like to do so, are particularly interested in the subject. Clearly a grocer responding to the Senator's question and knowing that the Senator from Arkansas was the leading advocate of yellow oleo, would not return a questionnaire unless his own spreads contributed to the general objectives of the Senator. On the other hand, the investigation by shoppers determines conditions as they actually exist with a sale being made and recorded at the prices reported in the survey.

5. One other observation should be made about the price spreads. The oleo manufacturers—the distributors of this butter imitation—and the retailers of the country have become greatly concerned over the publicity about price spreads distributed by the dairy interests. All the branches of the industry are policing these spreads, therefore, to try and make a good showing and avoid supplying any ammunition to dairymen.

Nevertheless, despite the fact that manufacturers, distributors, and retailers are all on notice about the necessity for holding down spreads, the wide margins reported in the Donnelley survey prevailed in December of 1949.

6. There is one other factor that distorts the survey reported by Senator FULBRIGHT that should be mentioned. It has been found that in every State where yellow oleo was legalized, manufacturers and distributors introduced the new product at an abnormally low price during the first weeks or months it was on sale. In many cases, and this is shown in the Senator's own survey, the yellow product was sold below cost with the manufacturer or distributor actually absorbing some part of the Federal tax.

The purpose of this, of course, is obvious. The idea of the price cutting was to try and capture a large proportion of the market right at the very time yellow oleo was first being introduced to consumers. Subsequently, of course, the price can be boosted. These abnormally low prices, however, distort Senator FULBRIGHT's survey. Taken in conjunction with the fact that the survey itself was conducted by mail, one can conclude the results are meaningless.

OLEOMARGARINE PRICE SURVEY, PRICE SPREAD BETWEEN COLORED AND UNCOLORED OLEOMARGARINE IN VARIOUS CITIES, DECEMBER 1949

A survey made during December 1949 in various cities where both yellow and uncolored oleo are sold, indicates the range in prices at the retail grocery stores. Receipted sales slips and cartons are available to verify the purchases.

Average	44.6	20.3	23.1

The average difference in price of colored and uncolored oleo was 23.1 cents per pound—more than double the Federal tax and license fees.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to make the further observation that colored oleo has been given a particular exemption which no other food product has ever been given, with the exception of one product, namely, mint jelly. I ask Senators who are experts on the Pure Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act to tell us what product that agency has permitted to have artificially colored.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WILEY. I yield one more minute to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mint jelly is permitted to be colored green. The only other food which is artificially colored has been oleomargarine. Within the past month or two the Food and Drug Administration prohibited the manufacturers of noodles to include yellow tomatoes, which are a natural food product. The manufacturers wanted to have yellow tomatoes used in order to impart a yellow color to the noodles. The administration said that if that should happen, it would appear to the consumer that the noodles were egg noodles. Therefore, artificial coloring was prohibited.

I shall, at a later time, speak in more detail on the subject of artificial coloring in food products and the limitations on such practices.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, in the past week or so so much has been said in the Senate about the Federal taxes on oleomargarine that there are not, to the best of my knowledge, any facts on the subject which have not been brought out repeatedly in the debate thus far, and I have not the slightest intention of delaying the vote on this bill by adding to the talk.

On the other hand, in my broadcast last week, one of the regular biweekly series in which I report to the people of Pennsylvania the legislative goings-on in Washington, I attempted a brief summary of the legislative history of oleo, and I should like at this point to have my entire radio address printed in the body of the RECORD, because I believe it will make it clear where I stand on this issue and because I believe it will make it clear why I take the position which I take in support of oleo-tax repeal.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Soon after President Truman delivered his state of the Union address before a joint session of the Senate and the House of Representatives Wednesday, the Senate went to work on the job of repealing the Federal taxes on yellow oleomargarine.

Those of us who favor the repeal of the oleo tax—and we're in the majority—expected a filibuster to be delivered by a handful of dairy-State Senators, and from the looks of things, a mild form of filibuster is what we're getting.

A noisy and lengthy battle in the Senate over oleo was, I suppose, more or less inevitable when we stop to recall that for about three-quarters of a century, oleo has had a pretty bad time at the hands of the Congress, and in the State legislatures all over the country.

By the 1880's margarine had appeared on the market as a widely hailed and cheaper substitute for butter. But all too frequently, in those days, it was unscientifically made, impure, and in too many instances, constituted a real threat to health.

So the earliest laws passed by Congress and the State legislatures were, more or less, in the nature of pure-food regulations designed to protect the public from misrepresentation, and to prevent the sale of an unsanitary and injurious product.

In a short time those laws had the desired effect of raising the production standards for oleo, and with the assistance of science and by more careful methods of manufacture, oleo became a safe and adequate foodstuff. When oleo became safe, it began to present a real competitive threat to butter, especially when colored to look like it.

So the emphasis on the oleo laws underwent a change of purpose from health protection to protection of the butter producer against competition from a less expensive substitute.

Many techniques for eliminating competition were developed—some of them almost fantastic. For example, there were repeated efforts made to require oleo to be colored blue or pink or green before it could be put up for sale. Others suggested that it be shaped like a bar of soap or a piece of pie.

These efforts were more or less unsuccessful, though at one time—I believe it was in New Hampshire many years ago—there was a State law that required all oleo to be pink. The Supreme Court, however, held the law to be unconstitutional.

Two other techniques proved more successful. One of them simply prohibits the sale of yellow oleo within a State. Pennsylvania and 15 other States at present forbid the sale of yellow oleo—and housewives will have to continue adding color by hand until the State legislature at Harrisburg repeals the existing prohibition.

The second successful technique for protecting butter is illustrated by the Federal taxes we're seeking to repeal in the Senate. These Federal taxes have been on the books pretty much in their present form since 1902—and they hit oleo, not once, but over and over again. There's a Federal tax of $600 a year on the oleo producer—another Federal tax of $480 a year on the wholesaler of yellow oleo—and another of $48 a year on the retailer. In addition to these taxes, every pound of yellow oleo is taxed 10 cents, as compared to one-quarter of a cent a pound on uncolored oleo. So, as you can see, the direct tax on the yellow product is 40 times greater—a big discrimination.

The bill now before the Senate seeks to repeal all these Federal taxes.

I want to make it clear, however, that our repeal bill does not do away with the requirements that oleo be pure and nutritious. In fact, the bill on this point goes quite far in that it seeks to regulate the sale of all oleo served in public places, whether it is made in one State, and shipped through the channels of interstate commerce to another State, or whether it is made and sold in the same State. In both instances, our new bill, when passed will require that all oleo be marked clearly as such.

We plan to prevent any possibility that oleo will be misrepresented to the consumer as butter. The customer in a restaurant will know whether he's getting butter or oleo—and so will the shopper in the stores.

I want to make it clear, also, that we recognize the vital importance of the dairy industry. We know that, in order to obtain the necessary supplies of fresh milk required for our people that we must overproduce milk most of the time to avoid any possibility of a shortage at any time. Both State and Federal laws have had as their basic purpose for years the maintenance of a thriving and healthy dairy industry, and in repealing the oleo taxes we have no intention of harming our supply of fresh and healthful dairy products—and no intention of harming those who produce them.

Now, frankly, I believe there are some big differences between butter and oleo. For one thing, as every shopper knows, oleo is cheaper to buy. For another, though I'll admit this is a matter of choice, I believe there's a big difference in taste between the two, and I personally prefer butter.

But what I do think is most important is that we should have the kind of law which makes it possible for the consumer to select what he wants—so long as he knows what he's getting—and I don't believe the consumer should be penalized by a group of taxes on yellow oleo which are primarily aimed at taxing oleo out of the market.

I think you can understand why it is that I intend to vote for repeal of the Federal oleo taxes—and I think you can understand, too, why I share with most of you the regret that this Federal tax relief won't mean much to us in Pennsylvania until the legislature at Harrisburg makes it possible for us to buy yellow oleo.

At the start of this broadcast, I mentioned that a majority of the Senate favored repeal of the oleo taxes—and I mentioned, too, that a handful of dairy-State Senators was trying to kill our efforts by a filibuster.

Now just what is a filibuster?

A filibuster is a tactic to avoid bringing an issue to a vote. Suppose that a small group of Senators is opposed to a particular measure and knows it lacks the votes to defeat the issue numerically. Now the only way to block passage of the bill is to prevent the Senate from voting on it. The technique of the filibustering Senator, determined to prevent a vote, is to talk—to talk on and on—endlessly, on whatever he wants to talk about, for as long as he is physically able to stay on his feet and continue talking.

One Senator alone, obviously, can't tie up the wishes of the rest of the Senate for any prolonged period of time simply because one Senator just doesn't have the stamina to talk long enough to stave off a vote.

But when there is a well-disciplined, well-led, and determined group of 15 or more Senators banded together, a group of this size generally has been successful in the past at talking so long that the majority of the Senate is forced to give up its fight. The fight to break the filibuster has to be abandoned because there is usually some other very urgent business that must be finished before a deadline—perhaps a law about to expire that must be renewed, or an appropriation about to run out, or something of that sort, which must be done—and thus the filibuster fight is ended to undertake the pressing business.

It is particularly significant, I think, that the oleo filibuster—if we can call it that—is not a southern affair, though I know we've tended to think of the southerners as the great filibusterers of the Senate. The filibusterers on oleo are from the Middle West. The southerners are in favor of oleo-tax repeal, both to aid consumers, and because so much oleo is made from cottonseed oil.

Now why does the Senate permit a small bloc to dominate it on some issues that have overwhelming popular support?

The answer to this, I think, is found in the firmly rooted belief that free speech in the Senate should be absolutely free and unfettered. It's true, of course, that completely unrestrained speech can be the subject of abuse, and that is what happens when free and unlimited debate degenerates into a filibuster that has for its real purpose the blocking of legislation rather than the purpose of informing the Senate and the public on some new facts not previously brought to light.

The Senate, like any other parliamentary body, has adopted a set of rules that apply to the conduct of our business—and in those rules are to be found a number of limitations on unrestrained talk.

For example, a Senator will be forced to sit down if he attacks the morals or the propriety of another Senator's conduct. A Senator will lose the floor, too, if he attacks the motives or conduct of the House of Representatives.

Another means we frequently adopt for limiting the time we will debate an issue is to get the unanimous agreement of all the Senators to vote on a particular day and at a given hour. Once we reach a unanimous-consent agreement to vote at a definite hour, the remaining time is divided evenly between supporters and opponents of the measure—and when the appointed hour rolls around, the talk ends, and the issue is decided by vote.

Perhaps the most famous and controversial Senate rule has been our so-called cloture rule—Senate rule No. 22, adopted in 1917. Cloture is a means of curbing debate when efforts to obtain unanimous agreement have failed—in other words, by invoking cloture as we call it, debate may be halted if a certain percentage of the Senate is willing to see the talk stopped.

Cloture rule 22 provided, until it was changed last winter, that debate could be limited by the agreement of two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. Filibustering Senators, however, discovered some loopholes in rule 22, and it never proved to be effective when really needed.

The filibuster we had in the Senate last session came about as a result of an attempt to plug the loopholes, and provide an effective means of controlling useless talk. The debate in the early days of the filibuster last winter centered around what changes should be made in rule 22, and after several weeks, a cloture petition was filed. A crucial vote followed shortly on whether the Senate agreed with an interpretation given the old rule by Vice President BARKLEY.

The vote on the Barkley ruling split both the Democratic and Republican parties right down the middle. We on the Democratic side of the aisle realized, of course, that the Southern Senators would vote against the control of filibusters, and that it would be necessary to get strong Republican support if we were to emerge successfully. In a close vote, the Vice President's interpretation was voted down, with 23 Republicans and 23 Democrats voting against, and with 26 Democrats and 15 Republicans voting to support Mr. BARKLEY.

We knew then that the Senate's efforts to discipline itself in debate had taken a big set-back. Shortly after the vote on the Barkley ruling, Senator WHERRY, the Republican floor leader in the Senate, presented a compromise change in rule 22 that was satisfactory to the southern Senators and to the Republicans who had voted with them. The compromise plugs most of the gaps in the old rule 22, but it makes cloture much more difficult to obtain by the new requirement that 64 of the 96 Senators must agree to limit debate. Under the old rule, instead of 64 votes, it was only necessary to obtain agreement from two-thirds of the Senators present and voting. And this is a big and exceedingly important difference when you consider that on only two occasion in the past have 64 or more Senators been willing to invoke cloture.

The net effect of the new rule, I feel, is that certain classes of emotionally explosive legislation will remain for the present in a special category such that a determined group of opponents can block the will of Senate majority by the technique of filibustering.

I don't feel we will find it necessary to attempt a cloture vote on the oleo bill, because there aren't enough Senators seriously intent on talking it to death. We can usually break a filibuster where no more than eight or nine Senators are actively engaged. If there are 15 or 20 Senators willing to filibuster, this is a question which remains to be answered by testing the new rule 22. Since the southern Senators voted for the rule change adopted last year, they must feel safe in believing cloture can't be applied to some, at least, of the measures they are opposed to.

The filibuster question is essentially one of deciding whether, in the operation of our kind of democracy, a determined minority may block the will of the majority. It is a serious question, and in view of the set-back we took last year in attempting to get a rule that would curb filibusters, it may be a long time before we are able to work out an effective answer which in the first place provides an adequate opportunity for the exercise of free speech and which will at the same time allow the majority to act without jeopardizing the rights of minorities.

If you're interested in further, more technical details about filibustering in the Senate, I invite you to write me, Senator FRANCIS J. MYERS, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

I hope you will join me on this broadcast at the same time in 2 weeks.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I should like to add a brief statement to the remarks which I have already made.

I remember that when I first came to the Senate the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] would rise and, not only with the force of his logic, but with the force of his voice, would almost blow me out of the Senate, but I would be convinced. Since then I have seen him sometimes go off the deep end in his logic. This has happened when he and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] has disputed the validity of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Senator from Arkansas has even stated that the Supreme Court was wrong. That is the argument of the Communists. It reminds me of the boy marching down the street with his regiment, and his mother saw him out of step and said that every man in the regiment was out of step except her boy.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided this identical question as late as 1944, when the issue involved was the question of filled milk, when the Court said that the control of shipments in interstate commerce so as to prevent confusion or deception and substitution was within the power of Congress under the commerce clause.

In the original case Justice Stone stated that the question for decision was whether the Filled Milk Act of Congress prohibited the shipment in interstate commerce of skim milk containing any fat or oil other than milk fat so as to resemble milk or cream transcended the power of Congress to regulate interstate shipments or infringed on the fifth amendment. The Court decided the issue clearly and decisively.

Mr. President, I have to laugh when I think of my dear friends of the East who talk about restricting commerce. I have brought out the fact that we cannot ship our milk to New York. The people of the East have built barriers against it. If they had not built them, we could give the people in the cities in the East cheaper milk and better milk than that which is produced in the eastern area. But there are barriers.

The Supreme Court has decided distinctly, definitely, and clearly that it is within the power of Congress to do the identical thing which we are endeavoring to do.

Let me remind the Senate that the oleo industry has never sought to develop a new product. It has at all times worked solely to produce an imitation butter in every respect. The Congress has a right, under the Fair Standards Act, to protect the interest of the great dairy segment against imitation products.

I say, again, that the oleo industry has at all times worked to produce an exact imitation of butter. It has not developed a product having a distinctive flavor. It has developed the exact flavor of butter. The oleo manufacturers have not sought to produce a new and more appetizing color for their product. They have insisted on using the color of butter.

The oleo industry has not tried to develop new methods of packaging or serving, nor a new body or consistency for their product. No; at all times their goal has been to produce not a new product but solely an exact imitation in every respect and characteristic that can most easily be palmed off as butter.

Dr. E. V. McCollum, world-renowned nutritionist of Johns Hopkins University, has said:

> Who are the peoples of the earth who have used the dairy cow as the foster mother of the race? They are the people of northern Europe and North America. They are the tallest of stature, the longest-lived, have the lowest infant mortality, the greatest resistance to disease, and they are the only people on earth who have ever made any material progress in literature, science, and politics.

A strong, efficient, and healthy dairy industry means a strong and virile America, economically and physically.

Mr. President, when the Senator from Georgia says that the Congress of the United States has not the inherent power, under the commerce clause, to do what this bill seeks to do, he is off the beam. I am sorry to say it, but he cannot very effectively contradict the Supreme Court, which has the last say on the subject.

The Senator from Georgia admits that a measure providing for the repeal of the excise taxes, which is appended to the substitute which some 25 Senators signed, came out of his committee, was approved, and is on the calendar, but he says that if we attach it to this bill it will not pass. That does not sound very logical to the people of the hinterland, when the committee reports and approves the repeal of excise taxes. We have seen that there is a lot of talk but very little action in connection with every tax repeal. If we are to take the tax off oleo we might as well take it from furs, from tickets, and from other articles which have had such taxes imposed upon them.

Are we so imbecile in our activities that we think the thing we want to do has to be done according to the old pattern? Can we not put vitality into our actions and accomplish what we wish to accomplish?

Mr. President, the life of the dairy industry of this Nation is at stake. I repeat, that a strong, efficient, and healthy dairy industry means a strong and virile America, economically and physically. If this synthetic product is substituted for butter, and if the necessary vitamins are taken away, we shall be like the calves which have been referred to, which simply passed out of the picture.

So, Mr. President, I ask the Senate to face up to the situation with heads erect. We owe it to the people of the Nation. I could say a great deal about newspapers and magazines which have received millions of dollars from advertising, without doing anything more than to scratch the very surface of what is involved. We do not want creeping paralysis to attack the Middle West section of this country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Wisconsin has expired. All time for debate has expired, and the Senate will proceed to vote upon the Wiley substitute and amendments thereto, without further debate.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hill	Maybank
Anderson	Hoey	Millikin
Benton	Holland	Mundt
Brewster	Humphrey	Murray
Bricker	Hunt	Myers
Bridges	Ives	Neely

Gillette	McClellan	Watkins

Hendrickson	Malone	Young
Hickenlooper	Martin

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

Mr. WILEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WILEY. What is the first amendment before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Wisconsin and other Senators.

Mr. WILEY. May it be stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 4, beginning on page 5, line 3, running through line 20 on page 6.

Mr. CORDON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CORDON. Notice has been given of the intention to offer two amendments in the nature of perfecting amendments to the substitute. One of those was offered by the Senator from Oregon, and I wish to get a vote on the amendment I have offered. The question is which would be in order, perfection of the substitute, or a motion to strike from the substitute, which raises the point whether the amendment of the Senator from Oregon should be acted upon before the motion to strike.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Oregon or any other Senator desires to offer a perfecting amendment involving the section which the Senator from Washington seeks to strike out, it would be in order, and a vote would be taken on that first.

Mr. CORDON. In that situation, the Senator from Oregon calls up his amendment marked "1-13-50—A," and asks that it be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed on page 6, between lines 13 and 14, to insert a new subsection, as follows:

> (e) Effective on and after the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of enactment of this act, section 3475 of the Internal Revenue Code (tax on transportation of property) is hereby repealed.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is not debatable.

Mr. CORDON. I understand that, but in the amendment as stated there is an error due to a later printing of the substitute, and I ask that it be corrected. It should come on page 6, between lines 20 and 21, instead of between lines 13 and 14.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator modifies his amendment accordingly. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CORDON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. AIKEN answered in the affirmative when his name was called.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 6, between lines 20 and 21, it is proposed to insert a new subsection as follows:

> (e) Effective on and after the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of enactment of this act, section 3475 of the Internal Revenue Code (tax on transportation of property) is hereby repealed.

Mr. MAGNUSON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MAGNUSON. If the amendment of the Senator from Oregon should not prevail, would the next order of business be the amendment of the Senator from Washington?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unless some other Senator desired to amend the Senator's amendment. It is in order to offer perfecting amendments to it before it is voted on. The Secretary will resume the roll call.

The legislative clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

By Mr. GREEN:

A resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

"Senate resolution requesting the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States of America to use every effort in order that old Fort Adams, at Newport, R. I., may be made a national shrine and recreation center for the United States Army

"Whereas the old historical fort at Brenton's Point in Newport, known as Fort Adams, located in the city of Newport on the island of Aquidneck, surrounded by water on three sides in Narragansett Bay, has had a far-reaching history, even from the latter part of the sixteenth century, including:

"1. In 1740, order of the general assembly for a military barracks and storehouse on Brenton's Point;

"2. On December 20, 1775, General Washington considered Brenton's Point as a strategic point in the Nation's defense at that time;

"3. On April 6, 1776, hastily erected battery there drove the British back to sea, followed by capture by the British, the point under its command until July 10, 1780;

"4. July 4, 1779, Brenton's Point named John Adams in honor of our second President of the United States;

"5. May 2, 1799, the date of the first deed of record to the Government as a location for a fortification; and

"6. In 1842, Fort Adams became a permanent garrison and the building of the present fort was completed; and

"Whereas the harbor of Narragansett Bay is an ideal place for refuge for ships in time of storm, since it can take care of the entire Atlantic Fleet at one time; is a naval base for the United States Navy with the War College on Coasters Island, a part of Newport adjacent to Fort Adams; and

"Whereas the proposal under consideration of making Fort Adams, due to its ancient history, construction, and location, a national shrine would be an asset to our Government and to the city of Newport, whose ideal beauty for vacationists and summer residents is displayed in all its splendor along the ocean drive and rock-bound coast of the sea, the perfect set-up for a national museum and recreation center for the United States Army: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States of America be and they are urged to use every effort in order that old Fort Adams, at Newport, R. I., may be made a national shrine and recreation center for the United States Army and that they approach the authorities of the United States Department of the Interior with such an idea in mind, first, for the erection of a national museum at such site of old Fort Adams and, secondly, for the assigning of two companies of hand-picked soldiers to be stationed there for ceremonial duties; and be it further

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISING—PETITION

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am in receipt of another letter from Mrs. Nora B. Powell, State legislative director, WCTU, New Castle County, Del., transmitting a third petition signed by 55 citizens of New Castle and Kent Counties, Del., in support of legislation now pending before the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to prohibit the advertising of alcoholic beverages over the radio. This brings the total number of signers of the petitions sent in by Mrs. Powell to 2,191. I ask that this petition also be referred to the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be received and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—RESOLUTION OF OTSEGO COUNTY (N. Y.) BOARD OF SUPERVISORS

Mr. IVES. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the Otsego County (N. Y.) Board of Supervisors, protesting against the construction of a St. Lawrence seaway.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Board of Supervisors of St. Lawrence County has appropriated $5,000 for use in promoting and publicizing the proposed billion dollar St. Lawrence seaway project; and

Whereas this board of supervisors of Otsego County, N. Y., believe that the construction of the Federal St. Lawrence seaway is against the best interests of all the people of the State of New York and especially the interests of labor and business: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this board of supervisors for and in behalf of the people of the County of Otsego, N. Y., strongly oppose the construction of such St. Lawrence seaway project; and be it further

Resolved, That the clerk be and hereby is authorized and directed to send certified copies of this resolution to Hon. HERBERT LEHMAN and Hon. IRVING IVES, Senators representing New York State and Hon. BERNARD W. KEARNEY, Representative of the Thirty-first District of New York State.

DELIVERED-PRICE SYSTEMS AND FREIGHT-ABSORPTION PRACTICES—RESOLUTION OF NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF RETAIL DRUGGISTS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I desire to bring to the attention of the Senate a resolution adopted at the fifty-first annual convention of the National Association of Retail Druggists held in New York City during the week of September 18. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas S. 1008, which is now in conference, would, in the opinion of this association, destroy the effective use of the Robinson-Patman Act, a measure that has become the Rock of Gibraltar to the small-business men of this country; and

Whereas tremendous gains have been made by business in general under the Robinson-Patman Act by establishing fair competition, and requiring all sellers to treat all buyers alike without discrimination; and

Whereas the proponents of S. 1008 assert that its purpose is to legalize delivered prices and freight absorption; and

Whereas there is nothing in the antitrust laws forbidding delivered pricing or forbidding freight absorption, provided buyers are treated equally and are not subjected to the basic price or discount discrimination; and

Whereas the association asserts that S. 1008 was passed without due regard for proper hearings on the measure justified by its far-reaching importance: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National Association of Retail Druggists in convention assembled go on record strongly opposing the measure now in conference, and, because it was denied the privilege of doing so before hearings on the bill, that it communicate its reasons for opposition to the conference committee.

GENERAL PULASKI'S MEMORIAL DAY—RESOLUTION OF COMMON COUNCIL OF PULASKI, TENN.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the Common Council of the City of Pulaski, Tenn., favoring the enactment of legislation proclaiming October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to pass and the President of the United States to approve if passed the General Pulaski's Memorial Day resolution now pending in Congress

Whereas a resolution providing for the President of the United States of America to proclaim October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski is now pending in the present session of the United States Congress; and

Whereas the 11th day of October 1779 is the date in American history of the heroic death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, who died from wounds received on October 9, 1779, at the siege of Savannah, Ga.; and

Whereas the States of Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Nevada, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and other States of the Union, through legislative enactment designated October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day; and

Whereas it is fitting that the recurring anniversary of this day be commemorated with suitable patriotic and public exercises in observing and commemorating the heroic death of this great American hero of the Revolutionary War; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has by legislative enactment designated from October 11, 1929, to October 11, 1946, to be General Pulaski's Memorial Day in United States of America: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Common Council of the City of Pulaski, and State of Tennessee:

SECTION 1. That we hereby memoralize and petition the Congress of the United States to pass, and the President of the United States to approve, if passed, the General Pulaski's Memorial Day resolution now pending in the United States Congress.

SEC. 2. That certified copies of this resolution, properly authenticated, be sent forthwith to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, and each of the United States Senators and Representatives from Tennessee.

STRENGTHENING OF UNITED NATIONS—PETITION

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a petition signed by a large number of leading citizens from North Carolina, addressed to the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, in support of House Concurrent Resolution 64 and Senate Concurrent Resolution 56, relating to strengthening of the United Nations. The petition was signed by a large number of the outstanding men and women in North Carolina who have given sincere and earnest thought to world conditions and to the necessity for establishing and maintaining world peace.

Several resolutions have been submitted in the Senate looking toward amending the United Nations and to implementing that organization with sufficient power and authority to make it effective in the field of foreign relations.

I have joined as a sponsor for some of these resolutions. I think that all are good; however, after careful consideration of the resolutions submitted, I believe that this particular resolution would be most effective and I should like to see our Foreign Relations Committee take favorable action on it.

Although I was not one of the original sponsors of the resolution I take pleasure in giving it my support.

I ask unanimous consent that this petition be printed in the RECORD with all the signatures attached, and referred to the Foreign Relations Committee.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD with the signatures attached, as follows:

To the Members of the United States Congress from the State of North Carolina, Senator CLYDE R. HOEY, Senator FRANK P. GRAHAM, Hon. HERBERT C. BONNER, Hon. JOHN H. KERR, Hon. GRAHAM A. BARDEN, Hon. HAROLD D. COOLEY, Hon. THURMOND CHATHAM, Hon. CARL T. DURHAM, Hon. F. ERTEL CARLYLE, Hon. C. B. DEANE, Hon. R. L. DOUGHTON, Hon. HAMILTON C. JONES, Hon. A. L. BULWINKLE, Hon. MONROE M. REDDEN:

PETITION ENDORSING HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 64 AND SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 56

We, the undersigned citizens of North Carolina, believe that a just and lasting peace is the goal which our civilization must achieve; and that if we fail to achieve it, there is grave danger that our civilization will be destroyed. We believe that the only practicable way in which to achieve a just and lasting peace is through the establishment of a world federal government with limited but adequate powers. We believe that this may best be done by amending the Charter of the United Nations to develop it into such a limited world federal government; and that the United States should assume world leadership in advocating such amendments. Therefore, we endorse House Concurrent Resolution 64, sponsored by 105 Representatives, including North Carolina's THURMOND CHATHAM, and Senate Concurrent Resolution 56, sponsored by 21 Senators, including North Carolina's FRANK P. GRAHAM. These resolutions read substantially as follows:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that it should be a fundamental objective of the foreign policy of the United States to support and strengthen the United Nations, and to seek its development into a world federation open to all nations with defined and limited powers adequate to preserve peace and prevent aggression through the enactment, interpretation, and enforcement of world law."

We strongly urge that North Carolina's congressional delegation unanimously support these resolutions; that each member of the delegation publicly announce his support; and that each actively voice his support before the appropriate committees and on the floor of Congress.

(Mr. WILEY introduced Senate Joint Resolution 144, designating the week of February 14, 1950, as National Heart Week, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and appears under a separate heading.)

NATIONAL HEART WEEK

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a joint resolution requesting the President to proclaim the week of February 14, 1950, as National Heart Week, and I ask unanimous consent that an explanatory statement of the joint resolution, prepared by me, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the explanatory statement presented by the Senator from Wisconsin will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 144) designating the week of February 14, 1950, as National Heart Week, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The explanatory statement presented by Mr. WILEY is as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

NATIONAL HEART WEEK

Ordinarily, Mr. President, I would hesitate to offer a resolution of this sort, because I well recognize the tremendous number of commemorative resolutions which are introduced for a wide variety of other purposes. When, however, we are confronted by a certain killer, namely, diseases of the heart and circulation, which will claim the lives of 6,000,000 Americans now alive—when we are confronted with a killer responsible for 1 out of every 3 deaths in this country, it is quite clear that extraordinary action is necessary.

HEARINGS ON HEART INSTITUTE

We could cite page after page of dreaded statistics on the ravages of heart disease. We could show the tremendous economic cost, let alone the cost in human lives and suffering, because of heart ailments. However, undoubtedly most of my colleagues are more than well acquainted with many of these statistics, because they will recall that this problem has been presented to them before. For example, hearings on the subject of a proposed National Heart Institute were conducted on April 8 and 9, 1948, by a subcommittee of the Senate Labor Committee. At the start of those hearings, my distinguished colleague from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] said: "During the period we were engaged in World War II, nearly 2,000,000 people in America died of heart and artery ailments. This is approximately seven times the number killed in action in our armed forces in this war."

Other able testimony was offered by the senior Senators from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] and Montana [Mr. MURRAY].

Let us note, Mr. President, as brought out in those hearings and elsewhere, that heart disease kills 3 times as many as cancer, 6 times as many as accidents, 7 times as many as kidney disease, 9 times as many as pneumonia, and 10 times as many as tuberculosis.

TERRIBLE TOLL OF HEART DISEASE AMONG CHILDREN

And so the story of the terrible blight of this disease could be elaborated. One need only contemplate the terrible toll taken among the Nation's youngsters by rheumatic fever to ponder how critical this disease is. As a matter of fact, rheumatic fever and rheumatic heart disease are responsible for almost five times as many youth's deaths as infantile paralysis, whooping cough, diphtheria, scarlet fever, measles, and cerebrospinal meningitis combined.

WISCONSIN HEART ASSOCIATION

As usual, when a great challenge is presented, the American people respond magnificently to it through the American Heart Association and all the affiliated groups in the 48 States. It is my pleasure to serve as a sponsor of the Wisconsin Heart Association, acting in conjunction with organized medicine in my State and civic-minded laymen and public officers in trying to reduce the toll of these dreaded diseases. The able chairman for the 1950 campaign in the Badger State is Mr. G. V. Rork, president of the Northern States Power Co., of Eau Claire. President of the executive committee is Dr. Einar Daniels, of Milwaukee, executive secretary is Grant Laired. Some of the leading physicians of Wisconsin are enrolled in the Wisconsin Heart Association drive. Included in the prominent board of directors is our Governor, the Honorable Oscar Rennebohm and his excellency, Bishop John P. Treacy, of La Crosse.

RECOGNIZING PROBLEM'S GRAVITY

These illustrious gentlemen clearly recognize the magnitude of this problem. Today, more than 3,700,000 people are victims of heart disease. Hardening of the arteries and high blood pressure claim another 3,700,000 victims.

Of course, in all our comments on this problem, there is no intention to scare our people unduly. We certainly don't want to cause psychological problems about ailments which might not even exist in certain individuals. We do believe, however, that we can ask Americans to exercise reasonable precautions about their heart and to give generously in order to bring about greater research into the causes, treatment, and provention of heart ailments.

CONSTITUTION HALL PROGRAM

We are indeed proud that Washington, D. C., will be the scene of a gigantic "kick-off" for observance this year of the heart-fund drive.

At Constitution Hall on February 2, there will be a distinguished amateur show conducted for the District of Columbia Heart Association and for the entire heart drive throughout the country. The number of prominent amateurs who will participate in this program is so enormous and includes the names of so many Senators and Representatives in addition to the Vice President and Mrs. Barkley, leading officials of our armed forces, that I would not attempt to spell out all of the names because I could not do justice to all of the worthy folks who are lending their talents to this project.

I believe that particular thanks is due to the folks who have voluntarily set up this program, namely, to Ted Mack and the Original Amateur Hour Production. Some time ago, I understand that one of the Members of Congress who was preparing to work on this show said, "I think that all of the American people should know the fine group that is handling and paying all expenses of such an important public-service program." Ordinarily, neither that Member of Congress nor I believe in mentioning the name of a private business. But this organization certainly seems entitled to credit, so let me say a word of salute to Ted Mack and the Original Amateur Hour produced by the Major Bowes staff and presented by the makers of Old Gold cigarettes.

This Original Amateur Hour has given a number of truly splendid performances on behalf of a tremendous list of grand organizations, ranging from the Boys' Clubs of America to the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Archbishop Cushing's Children's Fund in Boston, the Crippled Children's Association, the National Jewish Hospital, and many other great outfits. The cost of every one of those shows was borne solely by the Original Amateur Hour organization.

In these days, Mr. President, when some folks get accustomed to thinking that only the Federal Government by itself can meet a given humanitarian need, it is heartwarming indeed to note the fact that private enterprise can mobilize talent and give that talent unstintingly without fanfare and without concern as to cost for a worthy public service. Moreover, it is encouraging to note that 150,000,000 Americans are willing to pitch in with their contributions.

CONCLUSION

I am sure that all of my colleagues intend, if it is at all possible, to be on hand in Constitution Hall on February 2, along with a packed audience of District citizens. I know that their presence and the participation by many of our associates will give a tremendous thrill to all of the folks who are working voluntarily to raise funds for the American Heart Association and its affiliates throughout the Nation.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I offer to House bill 2023 the amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 15, it is proposed to strike out all down through line 16 and insert the following:

(m) The sale or offering for sale of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine, or the possession or serving of colored oleomargarine or colored margarine in violation of section 407 (b), or 407 (c).

On page 3, between lines 2 and 3, insert the following new subsection:

(b) On and after July 1, 1950, no person shall sell, or offer for sale, colored oleomargarine or colored margarine unless it is manufactured, prepared, molded, shaped, and packaged so that (1) the net weight of the contents of the retail package shall not exceed 1 pound, (2) each part or parts of the contents of such package is manufactured, prepared, and molded so as to be triangular in shape.

On page 3, lines 3 and 23, redesignate subsections (b) and (c) as subsections (c) and (d), respectively.

On page 4, line 5, redesignate subsection (d) as subsection (e).

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, this amendment is offered as an added attraction to House bill 2023. It gives better identification to the molding of packaged oleomargarine. It simply states that it must be molded in triangular shape.

I hope the proponents of House bill 2023 in the Senate will be permitted to accept this amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me ask the Senator whether he has made any investigation as to whether the amendment would necessitate the installation of particularly adapted molding machinery, as differentiated from that now in the plants.

Mr. FREAR. In answer, I should like to say that it is anticipated that some necessary adjustments in the machinery already available will be necessary, but it is my understanding that the cost of such adjustments will not be excessive.

Mr. TYDINGS. I take it from what the Senator has said, then, that the same machines could be used, but the particular molding part of the machines would have to be altered or changed so as to conform with the Senator's amendment.

Mr. FREAR. The molding and the wrapping parts; yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me ask the Senator whether he has any idea what would be the cost to make the change required by his amendment.

Mr. FREAR. I have been informed by a reliable engineer that the over-all cost of changing the machines already in operation would be approximately less than one-fourth of a cent a pound on the number of pounds of oleomargarine now being marketed.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I have discussed this amendment with the Senator from Delaware. It has always been the position of those of us who seek to repeal the existing legislation on oleomargarine that we do not wish to have oleomargarine disguised as butter. It will be noted that one of the provisions of the bill coming from the committee provides an alternative method for the serving in restaurants of margarine in a triangular form. I think there is some question about the Frear amendment, that it might result in added cost to the consumer, but nevertheless, on the ground that it is consistent with the over-all objectives of the proponents of the pending legislation, I am prepared to accept the amendment, take it to conference, and if possible, perfect it—I hope, in a way that will be consistent with the original legislation—and not increase substantially the cost of margarine.

Mr. FREAR. I thank the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I should like to submit a question to the distinguished Senator from Delaware. As I heard the reading of the amendment, I heard the word "triangle" used. To be more definite, will the Senator kindly advise the Senate, is this an isosceles triangle, an equilateral triangle, or is it a part of the eternal triangle?

Mr. FREAR. In answer to the Senator from New Hampshire, I may say I am not so well versed on triangles as is the Senator from New Hampshire, but I should assume that any object having three sides is a triangle.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. With no reflection on the author of the amendment, I think it is a bit of obtuse triangle.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FREAR. I yield.

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware why these particular provisions with regard to yellow or colored oleomargarine are proposed? Is there any difference in the margarine content? Would it not apply to uncolored oleomargarine as well as to colored? I notice colored margarine is specifically singled out in the amendment.

Mr. FREAR. If it is uncolored, it would not be for sale, would it?

Mr. HICKENLOOPER. Mr. President, that goes to the meat of the argument, that uncolored oleomargarine is not readily salable to the American public. But I merely wondered whether the question of color was specifically brought out in the amendment in order to make oleo competitive, and to have it receptive, so far as being a substitute for butter is concerned.

Mr. FREAR. No, it was not, I may say in answer to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. FREAR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the pending bill, and ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be received and printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I desire to call up my amendment B to the bill, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, line 19, after the word "of", it is proposed to insert "the foregoing provisions of."

On page 5, line 3, to strike out the word "This" and insert in lieu thereof the following "The foregoing provisions of this."

On page 5, after line 6, to add the following new sections:

PURPOSE

SEC. 7. To guarantee, insofar as it lies within the constitutional power of the Congress so to do within the subject matter of sections 7–18 hereof, (a) that each and every citizen of the United States be secured in the equal protection of the laws of the United States, and of the several States, and (b) that no citizen of the United States be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, the Congress, in the exercise of all powers which it possesses, does hereby legislate with respect to the crime of lynching as hereinafter defined.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 8. Any assemblage of two or more persons which shall, without authority of law, exercise or attempt to exercise, by acts of physical force against person or property, any power of correction or punishment over any person, who is (1) in the custody of any peace officer, or (2) charged with or convicted of the commission of any criminal offense, or (3) suspected by such assemblage of the commission of any criminal offense, with the purpose or consequence of preventing the apprehension or trial or punishment by law of such person, or of imposing a punishment, shall constitute a lynch mob within the meaning of sections 7–18 of this act. Any such exercise of power or attempt to exercise power by a lynch mob shall constitute lynching within the meaning of sections 7–18 of this act.

Mr. LANGER. I have offered this amendment, in order to find out whether the Senate, at long last, is going to give the poor people, both the whites and the Negroes, a square deal in America. Ever since 1932 with the exception of 2 years, during which time a Democratic President was in the White House, the great Democratic Party, which says it is for the poor people, which says it is for the depressed, has been in control of the Government. The Democrats said in 1933 they were going to pass the antipoll-tax bill and the antilynching bill. At that time they had a Democratic President, and they held two-thirds of the seats in the House of Representatives. I repeat, the Democratic Party, which says it is the friend of the poor people, both the poor whites and the poor Negroes, had a President in the White House for 16 long years. During that time the Democratic Party had a majority of 2 to 1 in the House of Representatives. Believe it or not, Mr. President, at one time there were only 16 Republican Senators and 80 Democratic Senators—80 to 16 in the Senate, 2 to 1 in the House of Representatives, and a Democratic President. 1933 went by and no anti-poll-tax bill was passed, no antilynching bill, no FEPC. 1934 went by with the Democrats in control—no anti-poll-tax bill, no antilynching law, no FEPC. In 1934, 1935, and 1936 there was the same result. Yet the men running for President and for the Senate and House of Representatives stood up on rostrums all over the country, appealing for votes, and said they were going to pass these various measures. I repeat, although the Democrats were in overwhelming control, they did not pass the legislation. We had a repetition of the same situation in 1940, and again in 1944. The New Deal was going to take care of the poor people, it was going to pass an antilynching bill, an anti-poll-tax bill, and an FEPC law. No action of any kind was taken by the so-called friends of the oppressed and the underprivileged.

The Republican Party obtained control of the Eightieth Congress. Before they held their convention, they were definite and specific as to what they were going to do. They held themselves out as the friends of these people. What happened all over the country? The Democratic Party kept upon its pay roll the leaders of all the societies and organizations that ostensibly were arranging meetings in order to promote the passage of an anti-poll-tax law and an antilynching bill and the FEPC. It is for that reason, Mr. President, in order to show up this hypocrisy on the part of the Democratic Party, that I have prepared and offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation for the purpose of ascertaining the names of all officers of associations, societies, committees, or other organizations, a principal purpose of which is to secure the enactment of antilynching, antipoll tax, fair employment practices, or related legislation, who have been on the pay roll of a political party at any time within the last 10 years.

The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of its investigation, together with such recommendations as it may deem desirable.

The resolution (S. Res. 209), submitted by Mr. LANGER, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I send the resolution to the desk. If it is adopted, what are we going to discover? We are going to discover that the head of the greatest organization of them all, the man who sends letters and telegrams to all Senators, was all this time on the pay roll of the Democratic Party. I am prepared further to show that one of the leading ladies ostensibly working to secure enactment of antipoll tax, antilynching, and FEPC legislation, also was on the pay roll of the Democratic Party. Whenever they got the word from the Democratic bosses, they called another congress. They got together people from all corners of the United States, and adopted resolutions in behalf of the Democratic Party.

It continued year after year. In fact, if any Senator has any doubt about it, I suggest he vote for my resolution when it comes up, so that the proof can be produced. Not only that, Mr. President, but I am prepared to show that the Democratic Party has sent certain persons all over the United States who are on the pay roll of the Government at what I consider to be very exorbitant salaries.

This resolution, as I have said, is submitted with the purpose of giving the facts to the poor whites and the Negroes of the United States so that they may determine who are their friends.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that during the Eightieth Congress it was the Republican Party which finally had enacted into law, by a majority of 3 votes, the right for Negroes in the Army to vote.

With reference to the Democratic Party having put these politicians on the pay roll, there is now in the city of Washington, called together from 40 States of the Union, between 4,000 and 5,000 delegates, or representatives, as they were called by the Washington Evening Star on Saturday. This conference of politicians again is busy going around buttonholing Senators and is again busy passing resolutions.

Mr. President, certainly the senior Senator from North Dakota cannot be charged with playing politics in this matter, because I think the last census showed that there were 210 Negroes of all ages in the State of North Dakota. There are considerably less than 100 Negro votes in the entire State. As a matter of fact, I doubt whether there are that many. There are perhaps 50 Negro votes in my State. I repeat, certainly the Senator from North Dakota cannot be charged with playing politics in this matter. I feel, however, Mr. President, that I am in a peculiar position, not only to bring to the attention of the Senate but to the attention of the entire Nation how the Democratic Party has played politics with the so-called Negro vote. I welcome the opportunity to do it.

I hold in my hand the Democratic platform which was adopted at Philadelphia a little over a year ago, in which the party pledged, time and time again, what it was going to do for the poor, the oppressed, and particularly for the Negro. The platform mentions antilynching bills, anti-poll-tax bills, and FEPC bills. Yet, Mr. President, the Democratic Party has been in control of the Government, with a majority of approximately 100 in the House of Representatives and a majority of from 10 to 12 in the Senate, with a Democratic President sitting in the White House, and during the Eighty-first Congress, first session, they did not even bring up such a bill upon which we might vote on this question. All we have had has been promises and no action. It is my considered judgment that we shall not get any action in the second session of the Eighty-first Congress at any time, in spite of the fact that for a long time two such bills have been upon the calendar.

I should like to reach a vote on the subject. I assume a motion will be made to table the resolution. I hope I may be accorded the courtesy of a yea-and-nay vote, so that the people may know who are their friends and who are their enemies.

I might say, Mr. President, that perhaps the best example—I shall give two examples—of how the Democratic Party has played with this segment of the American population, would be to cite the following occurrence:

Four years ago the education bill was being considered. It was introduced by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT]. I offered an amendment which provided that if any State did not apportion the State money fairly between Negroes and whites it would be barred from receiving any Federal aid. Who defeated that amendment? Every Senator on the floor received a telegram from a man by the name of Walter White who said he was the head of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. He asked us to vote against that amendment.

Mr. President, can you imagine a man, really, truly, honestly, and genuinely interested in getting a bill passed, being opposed to the amendment which I offered at that time?

I think it will be found, if the resolution be adopted, that Walter White was one of the men who at that very time was upon the pay roll of the Democratic Party, because he had a Federal job.

Let me give another illustration. At the time when the matter of seating the late Senator Bilbo was under consideration a colored lawyer in this city by the name of Perry Howard, wrote a letter in which he said:

> The bill you are now considering is valueless. Even if it is passed, it will mean nothing.

In that letter he offered certain amendments dealing with legislation in the States in which poll-tax laws are still in existence.

Did my distinguished brethren on the other side of the aisle adopt the recommendation made by Perry Howard, the colored lawyer to whom I have referred, a man who was a friend of the late Senator Bilbo? They did not. Mr. Howard said that even if the bill were passed it would be valueless, so far as actually permitting colored persons to vote.

So, Mr. President, at this time, because I believe it will very likely be the only opportunity in this entire session, and at the request of Edgar G. Brown, president of the National Negro Council, with a membership of 2,000,000 Negroes, I offer this amendment, and I shall offer two other amendments.

I should like to tell the Senate that again, just as I expected, I received a telegram from one of the Negro associations, an outfit headed, apparently, by a man by the name of Henderson, asking me not to bring up these amendments at this time. But I say that an honest man does not mind when an amendment comes up. An honest man, who has a sincere interest in trying to get a bill passed which, in my opinion, is a thousand times more important than is any oleomargarine bill, would not be sending a telegram of that kind unless he had some sinister interest. That is why I want my resolution to be referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee, and I want an investigation made to find out how many of these so-called Negro leaders have been betraying the Negro race and lying morning, noon, and night. They were lying in 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935, and 1936, down to the last election. They were lying to those poor people who were depending upon them, because they held high offices in some of the Negro organizations and in some of the poor-white organizations. I want those persons to appear under oath, to admit whether they were or were not upon the pay roll of the Government during the time the Democrats have been in control within the past 10 years.

In other words, Mr. President, at the request of Edgar G. Brown, president of the National Negro Council, with 2,000,000 members, I am asking for a square deal for the Negro people of the United States, the whole 13,000,000 of them, because they have not been getting a square deal. From 1933 up to the present time all they have been getting is promises, promises, and more promises. At election time candidates go out among these folk and say to them, "If only you will put us back in office, we will see that the anti-poll-tax bill and the antilynching bill and the FEPC bill are enacted."

Mr. President, we are at last asking for a show-down, to find out how many of the Democrats on the other side of the aisle, who since 1932 have been yelling that they are for all these measures, will stand up and be counted now when they have a chance to get this legislation enacted.

SOUTHERN REGIONAL EDUCATION

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I do not rise at this time to reply to the address just made by the distinguished senior Senator from North Dakota, although I must say that I completely agree with one position which he took—namely, that the handling of the subject of anti-poll-tax legislation by the leadership of the Democratic Party over a long period of years has been a distinctly political handling. To be entirely fair and impartial, however, it must be admitted that the handling of that same subject by the Republican Party during the same period of time has been equally and just as distinctly political. I remind my good friend, the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, of the fact that, in spite of the declaration in his party platform in 1944 to the effect that the anti-poll-tax question should be handled through a Federal constitutional amendment, instead of following that course the party in which he claims membership, when it got into control of the Senate and of the House after the elections of 1946, declined and refused to follow that perfectly correct and perfectly constitutional course of action, which that party itself had endorsed in its platform and to which it was solemnly committed and, instead, chose to approach the subject through a Federal anti-poll-tax statute of highly doubtful constitutionality, and refused to adopt the suggestion or follow the course which was urged by numerous southern Democratic Senators, who themselves advanced a constitutional amendment dealing with this subject, and who in this Congress, the Eighty-first Congress, in the first and opening days of this Congress, introduced such a proposed constitutional amendment, 10 of the southern Democratic Senators joining as joint authors and cosponsors of that measure.

So I think that while the distinguished Senator from North Dakota is applying the term "politics" to the handling of this very interesting and vital subject by the leadership of the Democratic Party all through recent years, he should, with equal fairness and impartiality, admit, with his customary candor, that exactly the same political handling of that subject has prevailed on his side of the aisle and in the party in which he claims membership. The leadership of both parties has made the issue a political football.

Mr. President, I regret, in a way, that the amendment just offered by the senior Senator from North Dakota has been proposed, because the subject matter to which I wish to address myself is one which has sometimes been confused with the civil-rights issue, but one which, in my humble judgment, at least, should never be confused with it. I feel so keenly on the subject that I would not have continued with my intention to present the remarks which I now propose to make on the subject of southern regional education but for the fact that my release has already been given to the press.

With that point made, Mr. President, I wish to discuss briefly the subject of southern regional education, and I hope that those Senators who are interested in the subject—and I think that embraces all of us—will take the time either to listen to what is said here this afternoon on the floor of the Senate or at least to examine the RECORD tomorrow upon this subject, because such tremendous progress has been made since this subject was mentioned on the floor of the Senate nearly 2 years ago that I think every Senator will want to be advised as to the scope of the progress made.

Mr. President, the Senators now present who were here in February 1948 may recall that at that time 28 southern Senators, of whom I was one, introduced and sponsored Senate Joint Resolution 191, which was a joint resolution designed to give the consent of Congress to the compact on regional education entered into between the 15 southern States at Tallahassee, Fla., on February 8, 1948. Representative SAM HOBBS, of Alabama, introduced in the House a companion measure, House Joint Resolution 334, which, after debate, passed the House on May 4, 1948, by the impressive vote of 235 to 45. I remind Senators that a subcommittee composed of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], who at that time was chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, and the then junior Senator from Rhode Island, Hon. J. Howard McGrath, now Attorney General of the United States, held hearings, and that the Committee on the Judiciary itself reported favorably to the Senate Senate Joint Resolution 191. Unfortunately, at the time this joint resolution was debated in the Senate, it became involved in the civil-rights discussion which was proceeding in the Senate during that session, and after protracted debate the Senate by the vote of 38 to 37 saw fit to recommit Senate Joint Resolution 191 to the Judiciary Committee for further consideration.

Undiscouraged by the fact that the consent of Congress was not given to the compact, the leaders of the southern regional education program deemed it so vital to the cause of higher education in the South that they went ahead with the program in those fields where the need was most imperative.

Mr. President and Senators, I now believe that it is timely, and I consider it a privilege, to report to the Congress and the Nation the swift and substantial progress that already has been made in southern regional education, and it is for that reason that I address the Senate at this time.

The most comprehensive and authoritative statement I have found on this subject is an article entitled "Regional Education: It Is Working in the South," by Dr. John E. Ivey, Jr., director, board of control for southern regional education, appearing at pages 278 to 280 of the December 1949 issue of State Government the official magazine of State affairs, published monthly by the Council of State Governments.

The distinguished author of this article, Dr. John E. Ivey, Jr., was formerly professor of sociology at the University of North Carolina, and was for several years chairman of the committee on southern regional studies for the American Council on Education, prior to his appointment as director, board of control, southern regional education, on August 1, 1948.

The statement by Dr. Ivey is as follows, and I quote it in full:

REGIONAL EDUCATION: IT IS WORKING IN THE SOUTH

(By John E. Ivey, Jr., director, board of control for southern regional education)

The South's regional education program, which was a dream of many years, a hope of recent years, and a formal resolution 2 years ago, today is a functioning reality.

It is in operation with the official sanction of 12 States and the participation of 14 institutions of higher education. This fall, nearly 400 students are enrolled under the program, in courses often not available to them just a year ago. Interest in similar programs has developed in other regions, with the Rocky Mountain and New England areas considering action.

The regional program already has expanded the educational facilities of the Southern States in the fields of medicine, veterinary medicine, and dentistry. It has widened the horizons of the States immeasurably, holding out the promise of an educational system equal to that of any area in the Nation or world.

The results attained in these 2 years of organizing and launching the program permit the hope of a sound contribution to the theory that States can work together on a regional basis to solve problems that are overwhelming in scope if tackled individually.

The South's regional program took shape in October, 1947, when the Southern Governors Conference agreed that a joint effort should be made to solve the educational problems they faced in common. Rising costs, limited facilities, growing enrollments, expanding demands—these were elements of the over-all problem in Georgia as they were in Tennessee, in Florida as they were in Virginia.

It made sense to the governors that cooperative effort was a logical approach to the solution. It made sense that instead of each State tackling the imposing problem in what would be a hopelessly unequal match, the States should pool their strength, and marshal their facilities in a program of self-help.

From this philosophy emerged a compact. It was a simple document, setting forth the aims of the participating States and outlining a plan of action. The governors signed the compact early in 1948, and agreed to submit it to their respective legislatures for approval.

The executive authority of the governors, however, was enough to create a regional council for education immediately. It was incorporated to get the program under way, and established offices in Atlanta in September 1948. The council membership included the governor and two members from each of the States.

These States were Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, Maryland, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia, and West Virginia.

The number of the council members later was increased to four from each State in order to make possible the appointment of a Negro representative from each State.

The council went into immediate action and determined that the greatest needs for regional action, so far as the South was concerned, were in the fields of medicine, veterinary medicine, and dentistry. The council staff at once began working out arrangements with institutions within the area whereby they would contract to provide services for students in other States within the compact where such services were not available.

The contracts stipulated that the States should pay $1,500 per year per student for medical and dental training, and $1,000 per year per student for veterinary training. The student enrolled under the program was assured of a place at the institution, provided he qualified scholastically, and was not charged the usual out-of-State fees. He had the other normal expenses, just as he would have if he attended school in his own State.

This arrangement permitted a State to obtain facilities of a two- or three-million-dollar school for a few thousand dollars annually; it provided the student education he would not get otherwise; it gave the institutions additional revenue, with the contracts stipulating that the money must be spent within the school providing the service.

As the application of the program developed on one hand, the firmness of the regional structure grew on the other. In December of 1948, the governors and other council members approved a biennium program involving, in round numbers, one and one-half million dollars.

As legislatures of the various States met, the program was presented and approved. Within a few months, 11 States had enacted bills, making them partners in this, the Nation's first regional venture in the field of education.

With the formal approval of these States, the Regional Council for Education gave way to a board of control, established on a permanent basis at a meeting in Daytona Beach in June, 1949. Like the council, the board membership includes the governor and three members from each participating State.

By September, 1949, the voluminous detail involved in the working out of some 40 contracts had been cleared, the States had adopted procedures for certifying students, and 388 of these students were enrolled. Those students are scattered among institutions all over the South.

Four institutions are providing services in veterinary medicine—Alabama Polytechnic Institute, Tuskegee Institute, the University of Georgia, and Oklahoma Agriculture and Mechanical College. Seven universities are providing medical training under the program—Vanderbilt, Tennessee, Tulane, Louisiana State, Meharry Medical College, Duke, and Emory. Six institutions are providing dental training—Maryland, Loyola of Louisiana, Meharry, Tennessee, Emory, and the Medical College of Virginia.

Thus, the students from Mississippi who aspired to veterinary training with little hope heretofore, this year were eligible for such a school elsewhere in their region. Florida students who want to help fill the South's great and growing need for doctors could get medical training, although there is no medical school in their State. Meharry's fine medical college for Negroes at Nashville has been literally saved by the program, which creates a means of continuous financing through the regional agreements.

The program operates to benefit all students. Of the total enrolled in the first semester of operation of the program, 181 are Negro and 207 are white. Facilities in all three of the fields offered are available to both; admission policies are controlled, of course, by the institutions themselves.

The immediate response to the facilities offered by the regional program underscored the need for such services. But the opportunities are just as great from other methods of joint action: the exchange of faculty members, for example; the joint use of research facilities and joint research projects; the voluntary specialization in offerings; and the movement of students from one institution to another in completing specialized study and getting the best instruction available from several universities.

The Oak Ridge Institute for Nuclear Studies, where 24 universities are making use of the incomparable facilities of the Oak Ridge laboratories, probably is the most dramatic illustration of the possibilities from such agreements.

The South's regional program of education has an unlimited future as it develops these methods of cooperation and moves toward an efficient, intelligent use of its resources.

The contract-for-services phase of the program has been involved by the State of Maryland in a suit brought against that State by a Negro student seeking admission to the university school of nursing. The State of Maryland said that, by providing facilities through the regional program at Meharry Medical College, it was meeting the requirements of equal facilities. The board of control for the regional education program filed an intervention, clarifying its position. The intervention stated:

"The Board of Control for Southern Regional Education was established for the purpose of assisting States and institutions and agencies concerned with higher education in their efforts to advance knowledge and improve the social and economic level of the southern region.

"The board's position is that it shall make regional arrangements to supplement educational facilities within States. It is not the purpose of the board that the regional compact and the contracts for educational services thereunder shall serve any State as a legal defense for avoiding responsibilities established or defined under the existing State and Federal laws and court decisions."

The Baltimore City court ruled in favor of Maryland; the student's attorney has given notice of appeal. It is expected that the case will go eventually to the United States Supreme Court.

The board's policy since its formation has been that the issue of facilities for Negroes and whites was one that must be settled within each State. It has held that the board should not and could not become involved in political and racial questions and accomplish its goal of building within the South an educational system second to none. The program was not conceived as a means of modifying responsibilities placed on States by law. Its conception was on the sound vision that the people and institutions of the South, just as those in any region anywhere in the Nation, can solve common problems by using the resources available to them all; by recognizing needs on a regional basis and meeting them at that level; by rising above State allegiance to broader citizenship that means deeper accomplishment for the good of all.

As the South pools its resources in the educational field, it pools its needs as a natural sequence. It must assay those areas where there are similar deficiencies, else the union of resources would be like an army unable to find the foe. What are the needs? What types of education do we require? How much of what types of education do we, as a region, need? This part of the program, too, falls to the board of control as created by the Southern Governors' Conference.

In aiding States, institution, and agencies, the board "explores fully, recommends, where desirable, and develops, where needed, interstate collaboration in the support, expansion, or establishment of regional services or schools for graduate, professional, and technical education."

The southern regional program has plans well under way to extend the project into additional fields. A commission on social work, one on forestry, and another on graduate work already have been named, and have held preliminary meetings. The commissions are made up of educators and professional people drawn from institutions and industry in all sections of the region. The board enlists the commission members, assembles data, compiles records, and in other ways aids the commissions.

In October, more than 100 educators from 43 institutions in 12 Southern States met in Savannah under auspices of the board and for a week joined in intensive discussion of the regional needs and opportunities in the field of graduate study. Months of research were conducted by the board's staff prior to this meeting, so that a picture of graduate work and demands for such study, more comprehensive than any ever before compiled in the South, was available to guide the group in reaching conclusions and drafting recommendations on extension of the regional program into this field.

There are some who feel that this field of graduate study is perhaps the richest for the South, or any other region, to cultivate. Clearly, the smaller number of students in these higher strata makes the cost of meeting the needs higher, and just as clearly, the value to society of developing the leadership from this field makes it an imperative investment. If any region fails to make the investment it is going to lose its most promising youth to another region that is not failing to do so. And even more serious, its most competent people may be unable to reach any graduate school whatever.

As Governor Gordon Browning, of Tennessee, said in an address at the work conference on graduate studies in Savannah: "We can look, I hope, to the public schools and the colleges for creating an educated populace, clear-headed and straight-thinking, unswayed by appeals to prejudices and unfounded fears either from within or without the country, and at the same time firmly grounded in the great spiritual ideals on which America rests for security. But we must look to the graduate schools and the professional schools, public and private, for new insights and knowledge obtained through painstaking, objective research and for the education and training of a leadership which can help us move more rapidly toward our material and spiritual goals."

The philosophy of a regional education program is that the goals can be attained not only much more quickly but more thoroughly than on a State-by-State basis, where duplication, so often spurred by competition, is the rule rather than the exception.

Too often one State has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars to build a great school in one field because a neighboring State has forged ahead in that field. Thus, the immediate area finds itself with two schools in this field, and no adequate school in another field. Properly developed, regional guidance can channel the wealth and manpower of the region away from such expensive duplication and into an integrated program profitable to all States within the region.

The possibilities of such programs are being surveyed not only in the field of education, but elsewhere. In this regard, it is interesting to note the exploration under way by Western States into the feasibility of a regional approach to the problems of social welfare. The Western Interstate Committee on Institutional Care, created in 1946, has conducted broad studies on the value of regional institutions for the deaf, the blind, and the cerebral palsied. The problem of institutions for juvenile delinquents, women criminals, and mental patients also has been surveyed for attack on a regional basis.

This story, like that of the South's regional education program, is a story of States engaging actively and boldly to meet their problems without turning to the Federal Government for a solution.

Such programs, devised by the States, financed by the States, controlled by the States, and operated by the States, are a positive demonstration of States meeting their responsibilities as well as executing their rights. Above all, they are the means to a greater development of our regional resources and thus to the building of a greater America.

Mr. President, that concludes the statement written by Dr. Ivey. Among its highlights are the following: That southern regional education already is functioning in three fields of professional higher education, namely: medicine, dentistry, and veterinary science; that under this program a total of 388 students in these three fields, of whom 207 are white and 181 are Negro, are this year attending institutions of higher learning in southern States other than their own; that the funds which make this program possible are entirely State funds; that plans are already under way to extend this program into the fields of social work, forestry, and graduate work; and that the southern States through this program, devised by the States, financed by the States, controlled by the States, and operated by the States, are giving a positive demonstration that while they insist upon States' rights, they also propose to recognize and meet State responsibilities.

Mr. President, one indication of the large amount of public interest in the possibilities of this program is found in the number of articles written about it in recent months. As long ago as last July, Benjamin Fine, the eminent education editor of the New York Times, wrote in his column "Education in Review":

It is clear that the project is exceedingly significant. It can help the South build and develop a sound system of graduate and professional schools that will be the equal of any in the country. The implications not only for the South but for the rest of the country are far-reaching. A new pattern has appeared in higher education that will have a profound influence on colleges and universities everywhere.

Mr. President, so excellent is the article written by Dr. Benjamin Fine, as published in full in the New York Times of July 24, 1949, that at this time I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in full at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EDUCATION IN REVIEW—REGIONAL SYSTEM IS SEEN AS A GREAT ADVANCE IN HIGHER EDUCATION IN THE SOUTH

(By Benjamin Fine)

In a move expected to have vast educational implications, 11 Southern States have entered upon a mutual plan to aid one another in developing a sound program of higher education. For the first time in the history of this country, a regional system of education has been established. It will go into effect this fall.

For the time being the plan will cover only the fields of medicine, dentistry, and veterinary medicine. Under this project, the colleges and universities that now maintain such graduate schools will admit students from other States. They will be accepted on the same basis as residents of the States where these regional centers are situated. In this way, it is hoped, the South will be able to develop strong professional schools on a regional basis. Because of the tremendous expense involved in setting up a medical school, for example, it will be cheaper for a State to send its students to a medical school that already exists in a nearby State.

Last month a Board of Control for Southern Regional Education was created by action of 10 State legislatures—Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, and Tennessee. Virginia has been admitted pending removal of certain legal objections. Alabama, Texas, and West Virginia are expected to join soon.

Various reasons prompted the creation of this board. For some time southern educators have recognized the fact that they could not hope to set up all the educational facilities needed on a State-wide basis. They knew that if they were to offer their students an adequate program of higher education they would have to cooperate and pool their resources.

COMPOSITION OF BOARD

The operation of the plan is simple. The board of control membership will include the Governor and three members—one a Negro—for each participating State.

Four institutions will provide services in veterinary medicine—Alabama Polytechnic Institute, Tuskegee Institute, the University of Georgia, and Oklahoma A. & M. College. They will accept 119 first-year students under the regional arrangements, and will receive $1,000 per student from the States. Seven universities—Duke, Emory, Louisiana State, Meharry Medical College, Tennessee, Tulane, and Vanderbilt—will admit 187 medical students, at $1,500 per student. Six institutions will provide services in dentistry—Emory, Loyola of Louisiana, Maryland, Medical College of Virginia, Meharry, and Tennessee. They will accept 210 students, and the States will pay them $1,500 per student.

Under the pooling arrangement, the universities will select the students according to their own admission policies and standards. However, the States will certify students as eligible, based on criteria that they establish. Under present plans, 233 white students and 231 Negro students will receive training in 1949–50 at a cost of $1,500,000 to the States. The plan will have no effect on present segregation policies; white and Negro students will continue to attend their own respective schools.

FURTHER DEVELOPMENT EXPECTED

Other fields are now under consideration. Regional arrangements may ultimately be adopted in graduate studies, social work, architecture, forestry, engineering, agricultural, and professional education. Moreover, according to the sponsors of the regional plan, other methods through which the institutions of higher learning can jointly serve the needs of the South might include joint use of research facilities, exchange of faculty members, and voluntary specialization.

According to Dr. John E. Ivey, Jr., director of the regional board, the widespread support that has been received from the South indicates that the new project will expand. He points out that by planning as a region the South can provide itself with the leadership, the imagination, and the skills which it needs.

Southern educators point out that the South has been dependent upon institutions in other regions for the training of leaders in many fields. In many Southern States no institution offers courses at the doctor of philosophy level in any field.

Regionalism in education, the university officials hold, is a way to improve both the quality and the quantity of advanced college training at a minimum cost. For example, there are five veterinary medical schools within the region. To provide plant facilities and develop a first-class veterinary college would cost close to $3,000,000. Thus the savings to a State under the regional plan will be considerable. Besides, it will help existing institutions strengthen their programs, rather than add other possibly second-rate ones to compete with the universities that now serve the South.

Enthusiastic support for the regional plan was expressed last week by Millard F. Caldwell, former Governor of Florida, chairman of the board of control. Mr. Caldwell said that the Southern States, working together, could build the finest system of higher education in the United States or the world. He said the alternative, on a State-wide rather than regional basis would mean that southern education would continue to limp along, unable to meet the total needs of the region.

DUPLICATION OF EFFORT

It is obvious, Mr. Caldwell went on, that many States are duplicating what others are doing and in many fields none is doing a first-rate job. Various fields are wholly ignored. No State, he pointed out, can supply the best in every phase of education, because of lack of money or because of insufficient students to create an adequate school. Regional planning and cooperation appear to be the answer.

Other sections of the country have manifested an interest in similar programs for their own needs. Dr. John Dale Russell, Director of the Division of Higher Education, United States Office of Education, believes that the pattern of cooperative support now being developed on a regional basis in the South can be extended ultimately to all the States and Territories. In fact, the American Council on Education is planning to call together representatives from various groups some time this fall to see if the regional plan can be put into practice elsewhere.

According to President Colgate W. Darden of the University of Virginia, the southern regional program will measurably stimulate and improve college and university facilities for both white and colored students. This plan, he stressed, is not in any way a racial one, as it will improve educational facilities for both whites and Negroes.

Tulane University, participating in the regional program in medicine, is confident that the plan will strengthen higher education as it will eliminate duplication of facilities. Similarly, the president of Louisiana State University sees two strengthening effects on educational facilities in the South: (1) It will provide immediately some expansion of professional education, and (2) the agitation and planning in connection with regional education will add to the general concern about education in the South.

LOW-COST SPECIALIZED TRAINING

The University of Tennessee, an ardent supporter of the regional plan since its inception, considers regional education a sensible method of giving southern youth the highest quality of specialized training at a minimum cost. The plan enables each participating institution to build exceptionally strong staffs in selected specialized fields instead of spreading its financial resources too thinly over a greater area of advanced studies.

From the standpoint of a privately endowed institution, the immediate effect of the regional plan, Emory University notes, will be to provide financial support in extremely expensive fields of professional education.

Meharry Medical College, where Negro students are trained, has signed a contract with the regional council to enroll competent students of the States in this region. President M. Don Clawson observes that it costs about $2,000 a year to educate a medical student. The tuition is $500, and now with the $1,500 that will be received from the State sending a student, the college will be in a sounder financial condition.

It is clear that the project is exceedingly significant. It can help the South build and develop a sound system of graduate and professional schools that will be the equal of any in the country. The implications not only for the South but for the rest of the country are far-reaching. A new pattern has appeared in higher education that will have a profound influence on colleges and universities everywhere.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, another article on the subject is found in Phylon, the Atlanta University Review of Race and Culture, just off the press. The article is entitled "Regional Education: An Experiment in Democracy," by Dr. John E. Ivey, Jr., the director of the regional board. This article closes with the statement:

This is an experiment in regional action. It is an effort to make democracy work within States and localities. Success in this venture has implications far beyond education and far beyond the borders of the South. Always, visions of a stronger Nation must form the pattern into which regions of the United States find their place.

Mr. President, I am pleased to call to the attention of the Senators a group of interesting articles on this subject in the January issue of Higher Education, published by the United States Office of Education, which issue is entirely devoted to the discussion of regional action in higher education. In this issue a distinguished group of educators pay tribute to the possibilities of interstate action in education and also to southern leadership in creating the first of such programs in the Nation's history. For example, Dr. Arthur J. Klein, dean emeritus of the College of Education at Ohio State University, says:

It is significant to note that the largest degree of leadership in the practical development of the ideas and the techniques of regionalism in higher education has been provided by the South.

He also notes that—

The degree of success thus far attained has been won by overcoming institutional, State governmental, and social localisms in a region where these characteristics have been supposed to be especially stubborn.

Some of the other outstanding contributors to this issue of Higher Education are Hon. Millard F. Caldwell, former Governor of Florida, and now chairman of the Board of Control for Southern Regional Education: Dr. William T. Sanger, president of the Medical College of Virginia; Dr. R. S. Sugg, dean of the Alabama Polytechnic Institute School of Veterinary Medicine; Dr. G. D. Humphrey, president of the University of Wyoming; and Dr. Ralph T. Esterquest, who is director of the Midwest's Interlibrary Center.

Mr. President, because of the widespread interest in these articles, I have had placed on the desk of each Senator a copy of the January issue of Higher Education. Let me again call the attention of the Senators now present to the fact that the editors of the January issue of the magazine, Higher Education, which is printed on the subject of higher education, by the United States Office of Education, have thought so highly of this experiment in the field of regional education in the South, that they have literally devoted the entire issue of the magazine, from cover to cover, to the consideration of that subject matter. Senators will find it well treated by prominent educators from all parts of the United States. I particularly ask and express the hope that Senators will not lose sight of the fact that upon the desk of each Senator is placed a copy of the January issue of the magazine, Higher Education.

And so, Mr. President and Senators, I hope that it is both timely and appropriate to invite your attention to the South with its pioneer program of regional education, the first in the Nation. It is with pleasure and pride that I note that the former Governor of my State, Hon. Millard F. Caldwell, who was one of the leaders in initiating this program, is still actively devoting a large portion of his time to this important work as chairman of the Board of Control for Southern Regional Education. I do not intend to imply that leadership for such developments exists only in the South. In 1946 the Western States formed their Interstate Committee on Institutional Care. That group has conducted studies of, first, the value of regional training institutions for the deaf, the blind, and the cerebral palsied; and, second, the handling on a regional basis of juvenile delinquents, women criminals, and mental patients. These same States now are concerned with setting up machinery to broaden their regional interests to include the field of higher education. At the Western Governors' Conference last November, Governor Caldwell reviewed the southern program. As I understand it, the Western Governors passed a resolution adopting the basic ideas of the southern plan. They have much leadership in such men as Gov. William Lee Knous, of Colorado, and President G. D. Humphrey, of the University of Wyoming.

(At this point, Mr. HOLLAND yielded to Mr. MARTIN and Mr. SALTONSTALL, for remarks upon the two hundred and forty-fourth anniversary of the birth of Benjamin Franklin, which remarks appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of Mr. HOLLAND'S speech.)

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, it was a pleasure to yield to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania and the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, because I am sure that every citizen of the United States, whether he lives in the good State of the birth of Benjamin Franklin, the State of Massachusetts, or in the State where he rose to such glory and honor, the State of Pennsylvania, feels that he, individually, has a personal interest and concern in Benjamin Franklin and in the giving of proper honor and recognition to this day. Certainly the citizens of Florida, I am sure, would want me to say, though at the time of the birth of Benjamin Franklin Florida was and had been for a long time, an area over which the armies of Spain held jurisdiction and in which Spanish functions and Spanish customs and even the Spanish language prevailed, we claim a common heritage in the fine things which were done by Benjamin Franklin for all Americans everywhere.

Now, to continue the trend of my statement, I am happy to call attention to the interest of the New England States. It so happens that this part of my remarks comes down to the New England States, so I shall hope that the distintinguished Senator from Massachusetts, with whom I have just been exchanging compliments, will pay heed to this portion of my remarks.

I am happy to call attention to the interest of the New England States.

Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut have joined together in forming a New England Educational Council. The present task of the council is, first, to prepare an inventory of educational services needed in New England, and second, to prepare an inventory of educational services now available. The results of these studies will be used, I believe, to recommend specific opportunities for coordination among the States in their educational planning and in the effective use of their present facilities.

Last June the Board of Control for Southern Regional Education was formally organized at Daytona Beach, Florida. At that time, Dr. John Dale Russell, director, division of higher education of the United States, spoke of the movement as "an historic step in education that is certain to have an important effect upon the whole country." This remark was a forerunner to the question: "What does regional action in higher education hold for the planning of national movements in higher education?" And a number of representatives from the regions I have mentioned have been working on this problem as well as thinking how they might best share with the Nation the experiences of the several regions now in action. Dr. George F. Zook, president of the American Council on Education, I am told, has taken the lead here by sponsoring planning meetings of those interested in and concerned with these questions. It is premature to predict, but I suspect that some significant developments for interregional collaboration will shortly result.

In summary, the States have opportunity to solve a great many of their problems by interstate planning and action. Thus far, the Southern States are giving a successful demonstration of how, through joining hands across State borders, they can produce a system of higher education which will raise the social and economic level of the region.

Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, and for the information of the Congress, a partial bibliography of materials relating to activities of the Board of Control for Southern Regional Education, and its predecessor, the Regional Council for Education.

There being no objection, the bibliography was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President and Senators, great progress has been made in the field of regional education, and further progress will be made not only in the South, but elsewhere in the United States. The Congress, as you know, because of the failure of the Senate to take favorable action, has not given its consent to the southern regional education compact, and the opponents strongly assert that consent is not necessary. The question of approval or disapproval, of course, is not now before the Senate, but I call to the attention of the Senators, Mr. President, that the States have, up to now, hesitated, and properly so, to expend large sums of money as capital outlays across State lines for the expansion of old or the creation of new educational facilities, because of the lack of congressional approval. Under the present situation the program is to all practical intents and purposes confined to the complete utilization of existing facilities and a wider distribution and availability of existing opportunities to the youth of the cooperating States. I hope and believe that congressional approval will come at a later date, and I urge all Senators to study carefully the splendid work being accomplished for both Negro and white citizens under the southern regional education program.

TWO HUNDRED AND FORTY-FOURTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

During the delivery of Mr. HOLLAND'S speech,

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, this being the two hundred and forty-fourth anniversary of the birth of Benjamin Franklin, I intended to speak for a few minutes, but, owing to the pressures of time in the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to have my remarks printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, Mr. MARTIN'S statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, today is the two hundred and forty-fourth anniversary of the birth of Benjamin Franklin, benefactor of all mankind, foremost champion of human liberty and one of the illustrious authors of American independence.

The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania proudly proclaims Benjamin Franklin as its first citizen. I am happy, on this anniversary, to pay tribute to his greatness and to recall, in praise and gratitude, his vast contribution to world progress and to the glory of the American Republic.

I am glad to recall also that this year marks the two hundredth anniversary of Franklin's first election to the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, of which he later became president, and thereby Governor of the State.

Mr. President, every activity in Dr. Franklin's many-sided career was touched with genius. He won world-wide fame as an author, scientist, philosopher, statesman, and diplomat. But he took great pride in his skill as a craftsman and his success as a businessman.

More than any other man of his time he looked into the future with prophetic vision and gave of his wisdom for the benefit of every generation of Americans.

Benjamin Franklin had a clear understanding of the nature of individual freedom. He recognized its priceless value in the affairs of men and nations. He had unlimited faith in the capacity of man for self-government.

He recognized honesty, industry, thrift, tolerance, and liberty as the prime essentials of national progress and individual welfare.

Liberty was the goal toward which he directed his countrymen at a time when much of the world suffered under the misrule of despots and tyrants.

His philosophy of individual freedom was expressed in his words which I now quote:

"They that can give up essential liberty to obtain a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety."

Franklin's words have come down to us through the years as an axiom of true Americanism. His warning should be remembered wherever the temptation is held out to sacrifice liberty in exchange for so-called security.

Today, as in Franklin's time, liberty cannot be taken for granted. It cannot survive when people place reliance upon government for security rather than upon their own efforts.

Well known in the writings of Dr. Franklin is a philosophical dissertation, told in simple language, and warning against the folly of paying too high a price for that which seems so attractive and so desirable.

The theme of this essay was based on a youthful experience when he bought a whistle paying four times its real worth. From that unprofitable transaction came the advice he gave in later years.

"Don't pay too much for your whistle."

"I conceive," wrote Dr. Franklin, "that a great part of the miseries of mankind are brought upon them by false estimates they have made of the value of things and by their giving too much for their whistles."

Dr. Franklin's reasoning is just as trustworthy and his conclusions just as valid today as they were in his day.

Liberty is too precious to be traded away for the attractive but deceptive promise of happiness and security to be provided by a paternalistic government.

Let us follow the teachings of Benjamin Franklin rather than the present-day exponents of an easy way of life.

Let us not make false estimates of the value of nonessentials in our pursuit of happiness.

Let us so shape our lives and the destinies of our Republic so that future generations shall not say of us that we paid dear, very dear, of our precious liberties in exchange for security that had no more real value than the whistle of Franklin's boyhood.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, coming as I do from the birthplace of Benjamin Franklin, I desire to join in the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, as I did last year, on this anniversary of Franklin's birth.

Mr. MARTIN. I thank the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts for his remark.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, one of the critical problems before the Congress during the past 2 or 3 years has been the quest to discover the key to the great Chinese puzzle presented by our far eastern policy. I think the key lies within the very snarl which makes the picture so puzzling, and I shall proceed to state what I believe it to be.

In self-imposed blindness we have entered, beginning at Yalta, into a whole series of agreements with the Communists which now come back to haunt us in the form of our conflicting and confusing policies. Each one of those agreements, if adhered to, would have held some promise for a world of peace and friendship. But each has proved to be merely one of the traps set by persons who do not know the meaning of good faith or principle. Those persons are the Communists.

Each agreement has carried with it a moral commitment, which we have sought to preserve. Our insistence on observing our moral obligations has left us far out on the limb time after time in the hard and cruel realities of world politics.

A gentleman is no match for a scoundrel, or a Communist.

It follows that now is the time to take off the gloves and adopt a policy as realistic as that of the Communists.

The many agreements I have mentioned have had these tragic effects:

First. They have violated the essential principle of open covenants, openly arrived at, and have nourished secret diplomacy.

Second. They have confused Congress, the people of the United States, and the nations of the world, as to where we stand from day to day.

Third. They have contained provisions which themselves violate international law. The cover-up practices and policies that result have further jeopardized our world position and our reputation for integrity.

Fourth. They have clouded the high purpose of bipartisanship in foreign policy, because they have shown how little the administration really cared for bipartisanship. It has been said the bipartisan policy was never called into use for the take-off, but only for the crash landing. Our Formosan policy, for instance, was formulated in a secret note at least as early as last October, and reaffirmed in another secret memorandum dated December 23. Such secrecy does nothing but kick bipartisanship out the window. And it has gone further, because not only have Republicans been shut off from discussing matters of fundamental policy, but even Democrats in Congress have been notified only after the fact.

Fifth. They cause our representatives in the United Nations to do one thing while the State Department has secretly decided on another policy.

Sixth. They have misled the Defense Department, the Chiefs of Staff, and the Security Council, who are concerned with the defense questions which follow from our foreign policy. For instance, it is clear that the State Department allowed the Chiefs of Staff to indulge in shadow boxing with the Security Council prior to the meeting of December 29, 1949, which presumably was a meeting to decide the Formosan question. The State Department had already decided that issue.

These are not the criticisms of a Republican. They are statements of fact. They are based on the record. They are important because they are the basis of questions which are being asked today by keen-minded Americans whose only interest is peace.

These are mistakes of the past which must be avoided in the future. These mistakes must not be repeated in the recognition of Communist China.

In the conflict between our ideology and communism, we need China and the Chinese on our side. For, first, one-half of the population of the world is located in Asia; and, second, one-half of Asia's population is in China. Her size, location, and resources make her the political and economic center of gravity in the east.

We recognized this when we made the Republic of China, which was a friend of the United States, a permanent member of the Security Council of the United Nations.

The avowed purpose of communism, whether it be in Russia, China, Yugoslavia, or Czechoslovakia, is to destroy capitalism. The conflict is global. It is for the minds of men. We must not forget we are on the defensive.

There can be no security in Europe, in the North Atlantic, or even in America, no real security anywhere, so long as communism is in a position to impose itself anywhere by force or infiltration, for all Communists are committed to the destruction of persons and peoples who oppose totalitarianism; all Communists imitate the Soviet regime, use its methods, and follow the Moscow party lines.

Recognition of Red China by any country which has been engaged in the fight to contain world communism is surrender on another front of the cold war.

If we recognize Red China, we completely abandon the hopes of all the people of the world, particularly those in southeastern Asia, who look to us for leadership in any effort to resist the inroads of communism. Economic assistance, or whatever else of that nature is planned, cannot buy faith in us if we place our stamp of approval on Communist aggression by recognizing the Chinese Reds.

A recent editorial in the New York Times aptly sums up the far-eastern situation. It was written after the President's press announcement of January 5 on Formosa. It has even more biting application today than it had at the time it was written. The editorial said:

> We have been bamboozled, outsmarted, and trapped into political and moral paralysis which was precisely what the Kremlin intended. There is only one thing left for us to do. We must retrench, regroup, and reform. We have admitted that the moral battlefield is lost. We dare not then lose the next one by the same processes of hesitation, divided counsel, and evasion.

The China question and the Formosa matter are not closed issues. Their nature does not permit them to be locked away like skeletons in a closet. Too many questions remain to be answered, and events may provide responses which no locked door can muffle.

We have yet to have an authoritative opinion, freely expressed, on the strategic importance of Formosa.

It now looks as if the Senate of the United States will be stymied on the question of Formosa's strategic importance until January 26, the date set for the appearance of the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the Secretary of National Defense before the Foreign Relations Committee.

A quick glance, however, at its history and geography should emphasize the strategic importance of Formosa. It contains 13,429 square miles of territory. It lies about 100 miles off the east coast of China. At one place it is only 90 miles offshore. Okinawa is to its north, and the Philippines are only 457 air miles away to the south and east. Japan is 780 air miles to the north and east.

The population is 6,500,000, of whom the main group is Chinese, mostly from the Chinese mainland provinces of Fukien and Kwangtung. The former natives number about 150,000, of whom 30,000 are still classed as savages. This makes Formosa predominantly Chinese and these Chinese have maintained close contact with their kinfolk on the mainland.

Japan has treated Formosa as of great strategic value since 1895 when it was ceded by the Chinese to Japan under the terms of the treaty following the Sino-Japanese War. Japan built it up as an island fortress for its future aggression. After Pearl Harbor Japan used Formosa to launch her attack upon the Philippines and Hongkong and to move southward to conquer the British Empire in southeast Asia.

General Douglas MacArthur, in a warning placed before the National Security Council and reported in the New York Herald Tribune of December 30, 1949, stated that—

> 1. Communist possession of Formosa would endanger the Philippines, American-held Okinawa and perhaps even Japan, and that
> 2. Communist drives made possible by a Formosa base might eventually push America's defenses back to the Marianas, the Hawaiian Islands, and the Pacific coast.

Strategic considerations must cover the possibilities should Formosa ever be occupied by an unfriendly power. This would be the case if the Communist Government of China occupied it, for it would be the same as though it were occupied by the Soviet Union.

On January 5, 1950, a New York Times dispatch from Moscow said:

> Soviet press comment made plain today that the new Chinese Government of Mao Tse-tung could be certain of the full support of the Soviet Union in efforts to establish sovereignty over Formosa.

With absolute certainty, the Chinese Communists are planning an invasion of Formosa as soon as the winter monsoon season in the Formosa Straits is over, which would be by early spring.

I am not satisfied at all that the legal status of Formosa, and our responsibility for it can be easily dismissed either. That is a subject which has not been fully explored in the debate of the past 10 days. I believe it is a subject which demands penetrating analysis, for it involves our national integrity.

I should like to examine that subject briefly at this time before proceeding to my further remarks on our future policy in the Far East and in our world-wide struggle with the forces of communism.

The President, in his January 5 statement, cited the provisions of the Cairo and Potsdam declarations as governing the status of Formosa.

The Cairo declaration was issued December 1, 1943, by President Roosevelt, Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, and Prime Minister Churchill. After a statement of general purposes for pressing the war in the Pacific, they stated:

It is their (the Allies) purpose that Japan shall be stripped of all the islands in the Pacific which she has seized or occupied since the beginning of the First World War in 1914, and that all the territories Japan has stolen from the Chinese, such as Manchuria, Formosa, and the Pescadores, shall be restored to the Republic of China.

Note that the term, "Republic of China," is used.

This 1943 declaration was seriously compromised by the secret Yalta agreement of early 1945, which promised Russia certain rights in Manchuria. However that may be, the Potsdam declaration of July 26, 1945, reiterated the Cairo terms in a proclamation defining terms for Japanese surrender, as follows:

The terms of the Cairo declaration shall be carried out and Japanese sovereignty shall be limited to the islands of Honshu, Hokkaido, Kyushu, and such minor islands as we determine.

The Potsdam declaration was signed by President Truman and Prime Minister Churchill and was concurred in by the President of the National Government of China. Russia announced its adherence to this declaration when it declared war on Japan August 5, 1945.

In accordance with these surrender terms Chinese Nationalist troops were designated to occupy Formosa when the Japanese surrendered.

What has happened subsequently raises the question of that island's legal status.

It has always been my understanding and belief that international law requires that territorial changes pursuant to a surrender be accomplished only by a treaty. That feature of international law has particular importance under our constitutional system, because treaties are made by the President of the United States "by and with the consent of the Senate."

It appears, however, that something else has happened with respect to Formosa.

Note that the statements issued at Cairo and Potsdam were purely declaratory in form. But pursuant to them, as the President said in his January 5 statement, "Formosa was surrendered to Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and for the past 4 years the United States and other allied powers have accepted the exercise of authority over the island."

What he said in effect was that by our conduct we are estopped to apply international law.

All the other countries of the world, including those in the Pacific, have a right to expect that we will not conduct ourselves in a way to wreck the principles of international law. Yet we have done just that. Take the application of the Atlantic Charter to Formosa.

The people of Formosa had a right to expect that the Atlantic Charter would be applied in their case. The Atlantic Charter says:

They (the signatories)—

And the United States of America was one of the signatories to the Atlantic Charter—

They (the signatories) desire to see no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the people concerned.

And—

They respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCFARLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. That part of the Atlantic Charter, of course, has been violated, and most flagrantly and atrociously in most all our peace arrangements; has it not?

Mr. FERGUSON. I agree with the Senator. But I think we should apply the principles of the Atlantic Charter if we are going to implement, let us say, a press declaration which attempts to give away Formosa.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I am delighted that the Senator from Michigan is entering into this field of inquiry, because I think there should be a foundation in the debate resting on the legal situation so far as Formosa is concerned. I think that involves the question of whether our military leaders during wartime can make permanent disposition of conquered territory. If they can do that, then there is no limit to the power of our military leaders. It seems to me they are entitled to make military dispositions and military arrangements which can last throughout the war, but it seems to me for them to assert that they can make permanent dispositions and permanent future peacetime arrangements because of their positions as military leaders, which necessarily are temporary ones, is to make a very swollen contention which runs contrary to the ultimate peace-treaty powers of the Senate.

Mr. FERGUSON. I appreciate that contribution by the able Senator from Colorado, and I thank him for his remarks, because they fit into the subject I am discussing. I think it is a subject which should be discussed here. I agree with the Senator and I am satisfied that in this case both the facts and the law agree with that analysis.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The question of the legal rights of the parties, so far as Formosa is concerned, of course, makes the greatest difference insofar as action by the United States is concerned, independent of communism or independent of that whole question. If the military leaders are charged in fact with holding the acquisitions from the enemy as trustees for the future disposition by the victorious powers there is a firm legal basis for occupation of Formosa regardless of the Communist question.

Mr. FERGUSON. I thank the Senator for his statement and I agree with it. Later in my remarks I wish to discuss the question of trusteeship. I believe the trusteeship of Gen. Chiang Kai-shek on the island of Formosa is the same as the trusteeship of General MacArthur in Japan, as the trusteeship of our General McCloy in Germany, and the trusteeship of our forces in Berlin. We are trustees until the peace treaty can be settled, and we, I am sure, would defend our trusteeship in Berlin, we would defend it in Germany, we would defend it in Japan.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. If we are unwilling to defend our trusteeship—if that is the correct term for it—we are then abandoning the consequences of the war, and we are abandoning our victory. Is not that clear?

Mr. FERGUSON. I think that is clear.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I congratulate the Senator on going into that phase of the question, and I hope he goes into it thoroughly, because I think if that is soundly premised, we have a good foundation for the occupation of Formosa independent of the Communist question, and that gets by all this business of whether we are interfering in civil wars, and what our duties are under those circumstances, and whether we are making other people angry by sticking our nose into their business. It comes down to the simple proposition, since the territory involved is conquered territory, of protecting that conquered territory until there is a formal disposition by treaty, in which this body has a direct and constitutional interest.

Mr. FERGUSON. I agree with that statement. It is more important because the Constitution of the United States provides that this body shall have the right to advise and consent to the treaty. Other nations may say it makes little difference to them, because their executive branch might be able to dispose of conquered territory differently than we can. But our Constitution is drawn up on the basis of a different philosophy. The philosophy is that the Senate of the United States shall say what the treaty will be at the conclusion of a war. Is that not correct?

Mr. MILLIKIN. It seems so to me.

Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Colorado.

Mr. MILLIKIN. When we get into these strategic considerations, we have no right to occupy a country simply because it has strategic advantages.

Mr. FERGUSON. I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. MILLIKIN. If that were so, we could have our forces all over the world, because there are many countries that have strategic advantages, countries which we might invade, as against certain future contingencies. But that gives us no excuse to move in.

I should like to see laid under this debate the kind of foundation the Senator from Michigan is approaching.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, the Cairo and Potsdam declarations would clearly seem to violate the terms of the Atlantic Charter, to which I have referred.

The nature of the de facto authority of the Republic of China over Formosa is another point in question.

The Chinese Nationalists clearly believe their authority to be complete, for they have set up in Formosa a government on the order of a provincial government. It is apparent that the United States has not always treated the possession of Formosa as absolute, however. In October 1949 we demanded that the Nationalist Government of China do certain things in relation to its government on Formosa. We even demanded that it change the governor of the island, which was done.

Mr. President, if the President of the United States is correct in saying that we gave Formosa to the Chinese Nationalist Government at the time of the Cairo Conference, why is it that the United States Government demanded certain reforms in the government of Formosa and demanded that a new governor be appointed? I think those facts show the absolute incorrectness of the statement that we did entirely give Formosa to the Chinese Nationalists. To the contrary, it seems to me that at that time, in October, we had in mind that the status of Formosa was to be settled finally by a treaty. As I have just pointed out, we even demanded that the governor of Formosa be changed.

Of course, we have not gone that far in our relationship with Spain; in the case of Spain, all we did was to recall our Ambassador.

Following our demand, the governor of Formosa was changed; and K. C. Wu is now the Governor. He is the Princeton-educated former mayor of Shanghai. I had the opportunity to see him in Formosa, just last December, and he impressed be with having a capacity to administer the affairs of the island. He has taken into office an overwhelming proportion of the local leaders of Formosa, three of his five committee members being Formosans. The Assembly, elected by the people of Formosa, is all Formosan. I had an opportunity to talk to some of the members of their parliamentary body at the time when I was there.

The State Department may say that the island of Formosa is ripe for revolution; but I found no evidence of that when I landed at the airport at Taipei, on Formosa. I shall give the facts upon which I base the statement that I found no such evidence. I was met there by Governor Chen, and we drove from the airport to the city—which has a population of more than half a million—and through the streets without an escort of any kind. Only the chauffeur accompanied us. When I returned to the airport from the city, again I drove with the Governor, leaving the city at 6:45 in the morning; and again we were driven to the airport without guard or without escort, other than the chauffeur.

Mr. President, those facts are absolute proof, to me, that the Communists on the island of Formosa did not have the upper hand. Governor Chen is the man whom the Government of the United States of America asked to have removed as governor. I made inquiry from soldiers there on the island. I made inquiry from other persons. I found that the condition regarding Communists was good. It is true that Communist activities existed, just as they exist here in the United States of America. But they were being reported by the natives—which clearly indicated that there was no foundation to the so-called revolution. The people of Formosa believe that the conduct of the United States and the reports which were being circulated were instigating allegations and rumors and charges of a revolution by the Communists on the island of Formosa, in order that it could be taken away from the Chinese Nationalists.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. I ask the Senator whether he believes that the Chiang administration of the island has been a good one.

Mr. FERGUSON. I shall answer that question in this way: For about a year, now, I have talked to our people in the embassy there, and I have talked to others; I have talked to Chinese; I have talked to members of the Formosa Assembly. They said a great reform was coming about. They said, for instance, that the ground rents had been reduced from about 60 percent, so that now not more than approximately 37½ percent could be charged; that certain rehabilitation, insofar as water was concerned, was going on; that money had been stabilized; and that conditions were much better than they had been.

However, when we compare the Government there with a government such as the one we have here in the United States, it was not good; but the people of Formosa, including members of the legislature who were Formosans, believed those reforms were taking place, that more of their own people were being taken into the Government, and that conditions were much better.

Mr. McMAHON. How long was the Senator from Michigan there?

Mr. FERGUSON. I was there 2 days.

Mr. McMAHON. How large is the island?

Mr. FERGUSON. It is about 800 miles long by 200 miles wide.

Mr. McMAHON. Was the Senator from Michigan in the capital of the island?

Mr. FERGUSON. I was.

Mr. McMAHON. Did the Senator from Michigan confer with the officials who now are administering the island—that is to say, Chiang officials?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. McMAHON. Did the Senator from Michigan go to any other city or any town in the interior?

Mr. FERGUSON. No. I went out into the country.

Mr. McMAHON. The Senator did so within the period of the 2 days in which he was on the island. Is that correct?

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct.

Mr. McMAHON. Did the Senator from Michigan talk with representatives of the other groups on the island, persons who were against Chiang?

Mr. FERGUSON. I talked to members of the Formosa Legislature, who were Formosans, and who were not in the Chiang regime at all.

Mr. McMAHON. It is upon the basis of the 2-day visit and the fact that the Senator from Michigan was in the capital of the island and for most of his time was with the Chiang adherents that he now wishes to tell us that, on the whole, the island has been fairly well administered and the Formosans as a whole are satisfied with the Chiang overlordship. Is that correct?

Mr. FERGUSON. Plus the fact that I had a long, personal conversation with General Sun, who is in charge of the training of the army. He was vitally interested in this question, and he discussed it, and said conditions were much better and, in fact, that at that time the condition was good.

Mr. McMAHON. The situation there had been rather brutal, had it not?

Mr. FERGUSON. I understand that at first it was not good.

Mr. McMAHON. The Nationalists killed hundreds of thousands of Formosans, did they not?

Mr. FERGUSON. I do not know the number.

Mr. McMAHON. When they went to Formosa, after the Japanese left, they rode with a rather high hand, did they not?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; they took over the island.

Mr. McMAHON. "Taking it over" is a euphemistic term for having brutalized the population and having destroyed their economy, according to my information.

Mr. FERGUSON. If I had that information I would give it here on the floor. I shall quote some statements which were made by John MacDonald, who was the American consul general.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I am glad to yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I was very much interested in the statement just made by the Senator from Connecticut. I do not know how long he spent on the island of Formosa, but I am interested to know where he got his information that hundreds of thousands of Formosans had been killed.

There was a period, immediately following the Japanese occupation, in which there was insurrection. However, the highest number I have ever heard estimated, even by the anti-Chiang group on the island, was that perhaps five or ten thousand people might have been killed—which would be altogether too many if it were done without reason, of course.

But I wondered where the Senator from Connecticut got his figure of hundreds of thousands.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I think the Senator's correction is a good one. What I should have said was that hundreds of thousands of them were brutalized, dispossessed of their property, starved, and beaten. That is my information. I think the Senator is correct in stating that hundreds of thousands were not killed.

In answer to the Senator's question about how long I stayed on the island, I wish to assure him that I have never been on the island. Perhaps, though, I am almost as competent to talk about it as if I had been there for 48 hours, because I think one of the great errors which can be committed is by persons who spend a few hours or a few days in a country, and then feel that they are entitled to set themselves up as experts on that subject. I should much prefer to form my own impression, in the alternative, upon the basis of careful estimates and careful testimony of men who have dealt for all their lives with these problems.

That is not to say to the Senator that I would not have welcomed adding to that my own personal observations; but I would hesitate, upon the basis of a 48-hour visit, to expatiate as to the economics, the political economy, or the military strategy which might be involved in a particular country.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this point?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I do not know whether the able Senator from Connecticut is or is not familiar with it, or whether the Senator from Michigan may be, but since the Senator from Connecticut says he would rely on people who had spent the greater part of their lifetime in studying Formosa, I should like to call his attention to a Department of State bulletin, volume 12, for the period January through June 1945; this particular one being the bulletin for June 3, 1945, volume 12, No. 310, the official document of the Department of State, and on page 1019, here is what the Department of State bulletin has to say relative to Formosa:

> Strategic factors greatly influence the problem of Formosa. With the exception of Singapore, no location in the Far East occupies such a controlling position. Formosa is separated from the continent of Asia by 100 miles; from the main island of the Philippines by 200 miles; and from Kyushu, the nearest home island of Japan, by 700 miles. Flying distance from military airports in Formosa is 559 miles to Manila, 410 miles to Canton, 428 miles to Shanghai, 1,290 miles to Tokyo. Formosa, larger than the State of Maryland, stands in a strategic relation to the China coast comparable for the United States to an imaginary island of such size 100 miles off the coast of North Carolina, 400 miles from New York City. Every point on the entire coast of China falls within a radius of 1,100 miles. A radius of 2,000 miles includes Burma, Singapore, Borneo, Guam, and Japan, including Hokkaido.
> Formosa has two important ports: Takao and Keelung. The main naval base is located in the Pescadores at Bako, which, in the hands of the Japanese, has been the most important base for Japanese aggression in the southwest Pacific and for preparation of the present war.

I call the Senator's attention to the very able statement in the Department of State bulletin, which runs entirely counter to the bulletin issued on December 23, in which it was said that the island had no strategic interest to this country.

Mr. FERGUSON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McMAHON. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from California to the fact that at the time the bulletin was written it was written with respect to an island that lay off the coast of China, and which was held by Chiang Kai-shek and his adherents. Today the island lies off land that is totally controlled by the Communists. I may say to the Senator, if the Senator from Michigan will indulge me further for a moment, that I do not welcome for one moment the possession of this island, or any other part of the globe, by those who have their policy dictated from the Kremlin. But I also say to the Senator I think it is high time it was pointed out that the future of the relationships between the Kremlin and the United States of America do not rest in any solution of the Formosan problem, nor do they rest, in my opinion, in any solution of the entire far-eastern situation. I am one of those who believe, and I think the Senate will understand why—at least, the Senator from California will understand why—that the heart of the question does not lie in Formosa or off the coast of China, but it rests in the fact that we are faced with the possession by the Soviet Union of power hitherto undreamed of, to be used, not in Formosa or off the China coast, but to be used, if the event ever occurs, here in the United States of America. It is time we began to reorient this situation and to put first things first. When that standard is applied it will be found that Formosa is near the bottom of a very long list.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I realize that the Senator from Connecticut is very critical of one who has come back from Formosa, and who spent a very short time there—too short a time to become an expert or to advise the Senator, who is on the Foreign Relations Committee, and whose party, as I understand, this morning in caucus decided to stand by the President upon this important issue. I realize also that the State Department was not anxious that any Senator visit the island of Formosa. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] advised the Senate how difficult it was for him to get to Formosa. I may state that I had very great difficulty in getting to Formosa. The State Department did not even make clearance for the plane in which I rode to Formosa.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I should merely like to clear up the statement the Senator made with respect to what happened at the Democratic conference this morning. There was no party vote taken at the conference.

Mr. FERGUSON. I should be glad to have the Senator clear it up.

Mr. LUCAS. Very well; I can clear it up. But I do not want the Senate to misunderstand it. In the party conference there was a consensus that the Foreign Relations Committee, headed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], so far as his position is concerned, was correct, and that the State Department and the President of the United States also were correct.

It is not the little thing we did in conference that is threatening to destroy the bipartisan foreign policy. Ever since they returned from the Old World a number of Senators, including the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], along with former President Hoover, have been talking about Formosa and about what ought to be done with Formosa. It seems to me that if anyone is attempting to destroy the bipartisan foreign policy, it is the junior Senator from Michigan, along with other Senators who are constantly, here, day after day, denouncing the State Department and the President with respect to what is going on in Formosa and China.

I could not let pass the statements which have been made without making this explanation, and I shall have more to say about the bipartisan foreign policy. What we did this morning does not in anywise destroy the bipartisan foreign policy of the United States. So far as I am concerned, and speaking for myself, I am stronger for the bipartisan foreign policy today than ever before. But it was the Senator from Ohio who recently said—and I heard his voice on the air—that there was no bipartisan foreign policy. He has been attempting to destroy the bipartisan foreign policy for years, and ever since he has been in the Senate. He has, I am afraid, just about convinced certain Senators they should go along with him with respect to it.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator has given his version as to what happened in the caucus. I merely want to read the press release, which I was paraphrasing. It reads as follows:

> The Senate's 54 Democrats were practically unanimous today in voicing their support at a party conference for President Truman's hands-off Formosa policy.
> Democratic Leader Lucas told reporters that majority Members had been asked to rally behind Mr. Truman and Secretary Acheson to offset Republican criticism of United States far-eastern policy.
> "The Democrats are practically united in support of the President and the State Department" and are "fearful that any intervention in Formosa would ultimately mean a shooting war," LUCAS said.

Mr. President, it is apparent we are now going to have some bipartisanship. Both the Republicans and the Democrats are going to have something to say about the Far East. We shall then have bipartisanship; but not if the decisions are to be made by the White House prior to the debate, and even prior to knowledge on the part of Congress of what is going on. I now ask any Democratic Senator upon the floor of the Senate to rise and tell us that, prior to the 5th day of January, he was consulted by the State Department or the President on what was to be said in the January 5 release.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield. I take it for granted the Senator is going to tell us.

Mr. McMAHON. I should like to make this comment to the Senator: I was not consulted by the President of the United States as to the action he took on that date. I may say to the Senator from Michigan, however, that, unlike him, I sat on the Foreign Relations Committee during the past spring and summer. As I stated recently, we listened to the admirals who visited the area in question, we listened to the generals, we listened to the Secretary of State and his assistants. We listened to the representatives of every single branch of the Government that had an interest in it. Before I had the honor to become a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, the committee even took time to listen to the Honorable Patrick J. Hurley. As a result of all that listening, I may say to the Senator that so far as I am concerned, in my estimate of the facts which were adduced before the committee, the President of the United States took a very sensible and judicious position in what he said on January 5. I cannot, therefore, quarrel with it for one moment. The Senator asked Democratic Senators to rise and state whether they were consulted. My answer is that the facts were placed before the Foreign Relations Committee—facts from which the logical position taken by the President of the United States eventuated.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I reply to the Senator's statement by saying that the junior Senator from Michigan consulted and conferred with generals and admirals who are now in the Far East on the question of Formosa, on the question of whether the situation should be handled by treaty, or by allowing Formosa to be taken. He received no such report as that which the generals and the admirals are said to have given to the committee.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a slight interruption?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I am glad to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. It goes on the very issue raised by the Senator from Connecticut. It so happens that on Saturday morning, January 14, 1950, the State Department released a statement dealing with the seizure by the Chinese Communists of our Peiping consulate property. This seizure took place at 9:50 a. m., January 14, Peiping time, which is 8:50 p. m., January 13, Washington time.

According to the official State Department release, the Chinese Communist military authorities, on January 6, issued a proclamation for the seizure of former foreign military barracks in Peiping. On January 7 the Communist authorities addressed an order to the Consul General for requisition of the United States Government-occupied property. On January 7 the United States Government informed the British Embassy of the Peiping developments, and on January 10 requested the good offices of the British Foreign Office to the end that the British officer in charge at Peiping be instructed personally to convey to the Communist regime the serious view we would take of such seizure of our property.

On January 10 the Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, met with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in the morning and in the afternoon. He met again with the Foreign Relations Committee on the morning of Friday, January 13. The Secretary of State also met with the House Foreign Affairs Committee on January 11. The developing Peiping situation was not disclosed to either committee of Congress. This despite the fact that on January 10, 11, and 13 the Secretary was meeting with the committees of Congress which deal with foreign relations. They were both in executive session primarily to discuss China and the Far East. I have no present knowledge as to whether or not the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee had any information regarding the Peiping situation prior to 8:50 p. m., January 13, Washington time, or 9:50 a. m., January 14, Peiping time, at which time the property was seized.

Yet here was very important information on a subject of vital importance to Senate and House committees and both committees were conveniently in executive session during the period of time the incident was approaching its climax. It is another example of the State Department lowering an iron curtain between itself and the responsible committees of the Congress. I hope that at the next meeting with Secretary Acheson the following questions will be asked and that the State Department will furnish definite answers and I call them to the attention of the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Connecticut:

First. On what day and hour did the cable relative to the January 6 proclamation by the Chinese military authorities reach the State Department?

Second. On what day and hour did the January 7 order of the Communist authorities addressed to the Consul General for requisition of United States Government-occupied property at 22 Legation Street under the prior order of January 6 reach the State Department?

Third. Was there any prior indication of any type or character written or verbal given to the American authorities at Peiping prior to the issuance of the January 6 proclamation that such action was being contemplated? If so, was such information conveyed to the State Department and on what date and at what hour was such information first received?

Mr. President, the exact time the first information concerning the issuance of the January 6th Communist military proclamation in Peiping reached the State Department becomes significant when it is recalled that on January 5 at approximately 10:30 a. m. the President of the United States was issuing his press statement relative to cutting off any further military supplies to the non-Communist Republic of China, on the island of Formosa, and the British Government, on January 6, was announcing its recognition of the Chinese Communist regime.

Was this merely one of the coincidences of history, or is there any particular significance in the timing of—

First. The President's announcement of January 5 relative to no more military supplies being available to the Nationalist Government of China;

Second. The Communist proclamation of January 6 announcing the taking over of United States property in Peiping; and Third. The January 6 recognition of the Communist regime by the British Government.

These and other matters deserve more attention than they have had to date. We can only expect to develop a sound foreign policy in the United States if both Congress and the American people have adequate information. The State Department, in my opinion, has been negligent in not keeping the proper committees of Congress informed.

Mr. FERGUSON. I thank the Senator for putting that statement into the RECORD at this place, because I believe it is a matter which should be debated by Senators on the floor. For that reason I have not requested that I be not interrupted, because I believe that in the give and take of debate on the floor we shall be able to solve, at least in our own minds, some of the problems and can advise the public as to exactly what is going on. At a later time I wish to make some remarks upon what happened on the 6th and 7th of January in Peiping, because I think it is very important in connection with a question which I shall discuss, which is the question of recognition of Red China.

When the debate took its present form I was discussing the question of what I found personally in the city of Taipei as to whether there was a revolution about to take place and whether the Nationalist Government was about to be overthrown. I merely cited my personal experiences, because I believe they demonstrate, at least to me, beyond any doubt, that there was not a revolution about to take place, because no governor will ride without escort if he knows or has any reason to believe there is going to be a revolution which is adverse or contrary to his ideas and his thinking. It demonstrated to me that the Communists did not have the upper hand in Formosa, or communism would have been raising its head in the chief capital city of that island.

The Communists naturally have tried to infiltrate into Formosa. Stringent measures were taken to prevent such infiltration by the Formosan administration, with considerable success. John J. MacDonald, American consul general in Formosa, stated that "there was no evidence that the Communists had begun infiltrating into Formosan affairs." That statement is from the New York Times, January 4, 1950. In case of a Communist invasion, therefore, the invaders cannot count on a Communist revolt on the island itself.

The Chinese Reds seem to hold no doubts or fears as to their rights or prospects in Formosa, for it is no secret that they are planning to project their conquest of Nationalist China to the food and industrial center on the island. That matter of right presents a question itself, however, as the Cairo and Potsdam Declarations state Formosa shall go to "The Republic of China" and it is my understanding that the Reds do not claim the character of the former republic as sucessors to the Nationalists.

There is conclusive proof, in fact, that the Chinese Communist authorities do not recognize and will not recognize the treaties of the Republic of China. It has been revealed that on January 13, at 8:50 p. m., Washington time, they proceeded to invade the American consular compound at Pekin. This was all in violation of the protocol signed at Pekin on September 7, 1901, by China and 11 other powers and that right was reaffirmed in the Sino-United States Treaty of 1943 under which the United States relinquished its territorial rights in China.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Did I correctly understand the distinguished Senator to say that the Communist regime in China does not claim to be the successor of the prior government?

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct. It claims that it is a new and independent government, a people's government, and it is not to take over any treaty or any other obligation. It will start with new sovereign rights.

Mr. MILLIKIN. If that be true, it would have a most profound effect on the status of that government in the United Nations.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, that is one of the nubs in this situation. There will be a new government asking to come into the United Nations with no obligations, so far as old Nationalist China is concerned, as to treaties or anything else. It will come in as a new so-called people's government. It is a totalitarian, communistic government.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Assuming the question of the admission of that government as a member of the Security Council, if it claims it is not the successor of the Republic of China, it has no right to sit as a permanent member of the Security Council, has it?

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, that will be the great issue in the Security Council. But I think it indicates clearly what has been occurring. We have recognized no obligation whatever.

I shall come back a little later to the Ward case. I conferred with Mr. Ward this morning on this subject, because I think it has direct significance.

When the Chinese Communists come to the United Nations seeking, with the aid of Russia, admission to the Security Council, they will probably take a different attitude, but today all their conduct and all their statements indicate that they are not going to assume any obligations of what they call the capitalistic government, because they are not its successor. That is why I argue that they should not, under any circumstances, be recognized.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Even if they came for admittance to the Security Council under that theory, that itself would raise a serious question. We denounced our first military alliance treaty with the Monarchy of France on the ground that we were no longer dealing with the same government with which we dealt when we entered into the treaty. In other words, we did not have a treaty with the successor revolutionary government of France, and therefore we kept out of the war which France at that time wanted us to get into against Britain.

Mr. FERGUSON. By now, however, the President of the United States and the Secretary of State appear clearly to have accepted a transfer of the sovereignty over Formosa, as evidenced by their statement of January 5. Such a position flies in the face of established international law. No matter what transfer may be predetermined by agreement among the conquering nations, there can be no finality in the transfer until a peace treaty is made.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am very glad to yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I correct in understanding that the able Senator contends that Japan in reality has legal possession of Formosa until a treaty is signed?

Mr. FERGUSON. No. I take the position that now Formosa is under a trusteeship.

Mr. LUCAS. Under what trusteeship?

Mr. FERGUSON. The same one under which General MacArthur is operating in Japan. He is there for all of the Allied Powers until a peace treaty is made.

Mr. LUCAS. Who is in charge of Formosa at the present time?

Mr. FERGUSON. Chiang Kai-shek's National Republic.

Mr. LUCAS. What right has Chiang Kai-shek there if in reality there is a trusteeship?

Mr. FERGUSON. I will state what right I think he has. He has been sent there by General MacArthur's order to take over the surrendered arms of the Japanese there, just as General MacArthur went into Japan to accept the surrender there. Chiang Kai-shek was sent there under an order of General MacArthur known as General Order No. 1, and it is the contention of the Senator from Michigan that he is there, in effect, as a trustee for all the Allied Powers until a peace treaty is made. I shall cite Mr. Martin, who was in the State Department, and I shall cite former Secretary of State Byrnes on the very question, to the effect that it was his opinion that a peace treaty was necessary before a final closing of sovereignty over these conquered nations.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with the Senator, but who has closed the final sovereignty? The mere statement which the President of the United States made the other day certainly does not close final sovereignty with respect to the island of Formosa. Certainly it will depend ultimately on a treaty between this country and other countries.

Mr. FERGUSON. But the President says in his statement that we have delivered Formosa to the Nationalist Government of China, and therefore we have no rights there at all, that we are estopped from saying that the Nationalist Government is not the supreme and the sovereign power, and it is my contention that Chiang Kai-shek is no more nor less than a trustee of the island of Formosa for all the Allied Powers, and I believe I can prove that.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Has the Senator from Michigan a copy of the order General MacArthur issued?

Mr. FERGUSON. I can get the Senator a copy of Order No. 1.

Mr. LUCAS. I think it is important that it go into the RECORD. I should like to see the order.

Mr. FERGUSON. I shall get it. I believe we are not very far apart in the way we think.

Mr. LUCAS. We are quite a way apart, just about as far apart as from here to Formosa. That is how far we are apart.

Mr. FERGUSON. Not if the Senator believes that a treaty should be made.

Mr. LUCAS. I understand the Senator's position perfectly, and I think the Senator understands my position. I am backing up the position of the President and the Secretary of State.

Mr. FERGUSON. Then we are far apart.

Mr. LUCAS. I know we are.

Mr. FERGUSON. We are just as far apart as from here to Formosa.

Mr. LUCAS. And we will remain that far apart, apparently, because I do not think there is any point at which the Senator from Michigan and I could agree between here and Formosa so long as he takes the position he does take.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, let me tell the Senator what Mr. Byrnes said and what Mr. Martin, of the State Department, said.

Mr. LUCAS. I have heard of many things Mr. Byrnes has said recently, and I should like to hear what he said a few years ago, too.

Mr. FERGUSON. I will tell the Senator what he said.

Mr. LUCAS. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. FERGUSON. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. MILLIKIN. In my opinion, the temporary occupancy of Formosa, no matter who may occupy it, is not the final decisive question, any more than is the fact that under war arrangements Russia is occupying eastern Germany.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator is correct.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Theoretically, at least, we have not abandoned our rights, as one of the victorious powers, to have a further say about the disposition of eastern Germany. We may be confronted with a fait accompli, and I am somewhat afraid we are, through the stupidity of the arrangements which were made Nevertheless, we still have a right to participate some day in treaty making with Germany which will determine, or should determine, what will happen to eastern Germany.

By the same token the mere fact that our Nation occupies a part of western Germany does not give us any claim to that territory. We are merely occupying it, just as I assume the Chinese Nationalists are occupying Formosa, to the extent such occupancy can be justified, as trustees, against the day of final settlement.

Mr. FERGUSON. It is the contention of the Senator from Michigan that that is the situation.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I believe it is a very sound contention. I should like, if I may, to make one further suggestion.

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Even if the Chinese Nationalists were not in Formosa at all, even if the Communists were in there, that would not preclude our assumption of responsibility for the final disposition of Formosa. We are obligated, in order to exploit our victory and to secure the results of it, and to meet our responsibilities, to see that Formosa is disposed of according to the final peace arrangements, and as a matter of right we are entitled to take these steps necessary to protect that trusteeship.

Mr. FERGUSON. I think that is the proper thing for us to do, under international law.

As I said, however, if we admit that the whole thing is ended, that legality has nothing to do with the situation, such a position flies in the face of established international law. No matter what transfers may be predetermined by agreement among the conquering nations, there can be no finality in the transfer until the peace treaty is made.

This principle of international law and its application in the case of Formosa is fully substantiated in the authoritative book, The Allied Occupation of Japan, by Edwin M. Martin. Interestingly enough, Mr. Martin is described in the foreword of that book as writing "with the great advantage of knowing, by virtue of his official position in the United States Department of State, the complex but seldom publicized interactions of political, economic, and strategic factors which shape the formulation and execution of occupation policy in Japan."

On page 35 of his book, referring to the Cairo and Potsdam declarations and their support by the United States, Great Britain, China, and Russia, Mr. Martin states:

> With this support, although legal confirmation of the transfer of the territories involved cannot take place until the signing of a peace treaty with Japan, de facto transfers have already been made.

To illustrate the underlying thesis, Mr. Martin notes in his discussion of the Micronesian Islands that—

> Since Japan did not possess full sovereignty over these islands, it is not considered by the United States to be a case of territorial cession requiring legal confirmation in the peace treaty with Japan.

That is from page 37.

Even more authoritative are the views of James F. Byrnes, as Secretary of State. The Department of State Bulletin for February 10, 1946, at page 189, reports a press and radio interview given by the Secretary on January 29, 1946, as follows:

> Asked whether it would be necessary to have a treaty of peace to formalize their transfer (the discussion concerned the Kueriles), the Secretary replied in the affirmative, adding that was his understanding of all these matters. Pointing out that someone might raise the question that where territory had preciously been in possession of a government, that would not be necessary, the Secretary said that it was his understanding that any cession of territory must be legalized in a treaty, either a treaty bebetween two countries or where a treaty has been forced upon a country that has surrendered, the government is required to sign.

Mr. President, if that is not international law, then the powers which were allied in the last war may sit down together, no matter whether they be the heads of states or subordinates, and may agree what is to take place, and the Constitution of the United States will never have its sway, will never be used, because the Senate of the United States will never hear about a treaty. No treaty will ever be required. Nations may be split up, nations may be divided. All-powerful will be the man who has the sword. That, however, is not the idea of international law. International law has in mind that after a war is over and men sit down around the table they will in sober moments settle the peace of the world, and that the various bodies required to approve the peace will have something to say.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question on that point?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. What is going to happen, then, to all the secret commitments which were made at Yalta and ratified at Potsdam? The carving up of the nations of the world has already been accomplished. Does the Senator from Michigan mean to say that when the time comes to sit down and write the peace the parties to the making of the peace will repudiate the selling down the river of countries that now have lost their freedom and have become a part of the Soviet regime, or are at least under her domination?

Mr. FERGUSON. I will answer that by saying that if the State Department's present position is correct, if former Secretary of State Byrnes was not correct, then Joe Stalin at the time the peace treaties are considered can say, "This matter or that matter was settled at Yalta; this matter or that matter was settled at Tehran; this matter or that matter was settled here or there." The result will be we shall have no real peace treaty.

I know the State Department will have to recede from its position. International law will not back up the State Department in its position. There is no logic, there is no justice in the present stand of the State Department.

The President of the United States, by issuing a press release, attempted to write a peace treaty so far as Formosa is concerned. I say to the President today that matters of such deep significance should not be settled by issuing a press release. Even though he believed the Republicans were getting into the act, even though he believed the Republicans were going to have something to say respecting foreign affairs, I say to him that the time was not ripe for him to rush in and, in effect, make a peace treaty by a press release. The matter is too serious to take snap judgment on and issue press releases about. Conquered territory should not be disposed of in violation of the Atlantic Charter. The press release represented a violation of the sacred principles of international law.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. As I understand, it is the Senator's position that, regardless of any commitment which might have been made by any representative of our Government, the constitutional processes should be adhered to and that anything that is the subject matter for a treaty should be brought before the Senate of the United States for its ratification.

Mr. FERGUSON. I believe that to be true. Any nation which deals with the President of the United States or deals with a general of the United States Army should be made aware of the limitations which the Constitution of the United States places upon them. The President, under the Constitution, has certain powers. During war he makes the war policy. But under international law, and as a matter of justice, he does not have all power. In other words, the President of the United States cannot say, as Louis XIV said, "I am the state," because, after all, the Constitution and the people are the state.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. I endorse and corroborate what the junior Senator from Michigan has said. The evidence which has been adduced is convincing that agreements and commitments have been made in the past few years which, if they had been brought before the Senate of the United States for ratification, would never, in my humble judgment, have been entered into or ratified.

While the case of Formosa is in a state of flux, while we are trustees for Formosa, I feel, as the Senator from Michigan does, that in the final analysis the people of the United States of America, through their chosen representatives, under their constitutional processes, have the right to pass upon the terms of the peace treaties and to say what shall be thus and what shall be so among the nations of the world.

Mr. FERGUSON. I thank the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. President, I have raised this question today because I believe it is fundamental to the future integrity of the United States of America, and it is important to our constitutional governmnet that we should think about it. We should make it the subject of bipartisan debate. We should debate the issue.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I am sorry to interrupt the Senator again. Will he yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The debate should be had before any bipartisan commitment is made. The debate should be had upon the Senate floor before representatives of any party pledge themselves respecting the present policy of the United States. If any proposed policy is hammered out here on the anvil of debate and of discussion, and agreement is reached concerning the policy, I shall be perfectly satisfied with such policy. But if we are to have the kind of bipartisan policy which enlarges and sustains commitments of men, when the issue was not brought before the Senate of the United States and here hammered out on the anvil of debate, then I ask the Senator, do we really have a bipartisan foreign policy?

Mr. FERGUSON. I believe such matters must be debated here. I know there are certain matters that can be taken up in Council. But the subject of the Far East was one respecting which the Republican Party was not consulted. As I said before, the President, being fearful that this question would be debated before he had issued an order, issued a press release, and in it he attempted to estop the United States of America forever from saying that international law should say something else. So I say that if the authority over Formosa has passed completely to the Chinese, it serves to justify the President's thinking, and his hands-off policy, but if that be true, this country has been guilty of a serious offense against international law, which requires territorial transfers to be confirmed by treaty; and the executive department has been guilty of an unpardonable offense against our constitutional processes, which require the Senate to ratify treaties.

On the other hand, if legal confirmation of the transfer can be made only by the peace treaty, Formosa has a status resembling a trusteeship until a treaty is made. In that case we, as one of the allies creating the trusteeship, are legally obliged to defend the status quo pending the signing of a treaty of peace. I ask the people of the United States, Why did we defend our sector of Berlin? Because we, as trustees, felt we had a right to hold that sector until the peace treaty should be signed. No one will contend that America wants forever to hold that sector of Berlin. We considered ourselves as trustees, we considered ourselves as being bound by international law, and even though it meant war, we said, "We will carry out the terms of that trusteeship." I see no difference between the case of the Island of Formosa and the case of our sector of Berlin.

In either case our international integrity is at issue. For that reason it is a matter which demands the fullest possible exploration.

The dilemma it represents illustrates the snarled position into which we have worked ourselves in our world position. It emphasizes that immediately we must retrench, regroup, and reform unless we are to entangle ourselves further in a manner which even the expenditure of our wealth cannot relieve.

The immediate test will be our attitude toward the recognition of Red China. Anticipating England's recognition, Pakistan, Burma, India have recognized the Communist regime in China. They did not want to be placed in the position of following Great Britain. England has extended recognition, in the hope of preserving its trade position in Asia. Other countries, such as Norway, have given recognition. The question is whether or not this country shall follow suit.

I wonder why our Government did not call to England's attention before she recognized Red China what President Coolidge said about recognition of Russia. This is what Mr. Coolidge said:

> I do not propose to barter away for the privilege of trade, any of the cherished rights of humanity. I do not propose to make merchandise of the American principle.

Had it been called to the attention of His Majesty's Government, in Great Britain that in effect the action of Britain was bartering away, for the privilege of trade in Hong Kong, the cherished rights of humanity, that it was making of the cherished rights of humanity and the principles of the British Empire merchandise for the highest bidder, the split between England and America respecting recognition, could have been avoided. England not only sold her birthright in this case for a mess of pottage, but she will be lucky if she gets a mouthful of pottage.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I suggest they will get a mouthful of ashes.

Let me suggest to the Senator that when we recognized Russia, in the hope, entertained by many, that we would better our trade relations with Russia, the direct contrary resulted. I will ask the Senator whether he knows of any increase in our trade rights in Russia since we recognized that nation?

Mr. FERGUSON. No; I do not. About all we got was a nest of espionage agents.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The Senator is exactly right. And all we have is the trade that Russia gives to us, entirely by sufferance. We have no right to trade in Russia at all, and have not had since the recognition.

Mr. FERGUSON. In other words, we get the crumbs from the table.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Yes. So I wonder whether we are simply preparing ourselves for the same sort of deadfall in the Orient.

Mr. FERGUSON. I shall discuss that question.

Mr. President, the United States has been known to follow suit on other occasions. That is why I wish to debate this question today. In this connection, we can recall the occasion when we followed the influence of the British Labor Government by withdrawing our Ambassador from Spain. Thereafter, when the representatives of that nation came before the United Nations, seeking recognition, we even refrained from voting. Imagine that, Mr. President. The representatives of the United States of America, which is supposed to stand upon principle, walked out and took the same position that we find Communist Russia taking time after time, namely, refraining from voting because they do not want to be counted.

We have as yet failed to draw any line of resistance to communism in the Orient, outside of Japan. We backed away from it in Formosa. We can still draw a line, if we will, with a firm policy of nonrecognition.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Is the Senator from Michigan familiar with the letter sent out by the Communist Party of New York State, under date of March 1, 1949? I hold a photostat copy of it in my hand.

Mr. FERGUSON. I wish the Senator would place it in the RECORD.

Mr. KNOWLAND. And is the Senator familiar with the fact that with the letter was sent an enclosure which included the following statement of program objectives:

> 2. Demand a new China policy.
> A. An end to all forms of American intervention in China and of plans to aid any elements and remnants of the Kuomintang.

Is not that the policy which, apparently, the Democratic caucus has gone on record in favor of today, namely, ending all aid to the Kuomintang in China?

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I think the press release so indicates.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I read further from the enclosure which was sent with the letter of March 1, 1949, by the Communist Party of New York State:

> B. Preparation by our Government to recognize the government which the people of China are now es'ablishing.

Is it not the Senator's impression that up until this most recent incident and the Angus Ward incident, the Government of the United States itself was prepared to recognize the Communist Government of China?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am very much satisfied that that is true.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I read further from the statement of program objectives accompanying the letter from the Communist Party of New York State:

> C. Planning now by our authorities for genuine and self-respecting cooperation with the people's government in China, including normal and friendly trade relations free of any political conditions.

Is it not the impression of the Senator from Michigan that up until this latest affront, we had deliberately left our consular officials behind the iron curtain in the hope of doing that very thing?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am satisfied that is true, and I think the debates on the floor of the Senate have indicated it, namely, that we took the attitude "Let's wait until the dust settles."

Mr. President, this debate will disclose what actually occurred, and I wish to discuss the Angus Ward case and the case of the loss of our consulate at Peking.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator from Michigan recall the colloquy which occured in the Senate last week between the distinguished senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], during which I rose and asked the Senator from Texas what he meant when he said that all the nations of the world were about to recognize Communist China? Does the Senator from Michigan remember that statement?

Mr. FERGUSON. I do.

Mr. WHERRY. In view of the statement just made by the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan, let me ask him whether he now feels that it was the intention of our State Department to recognize the Communists at that time.

Mr. FERGUSON. I do not know whether that was the intention at that particular time, and I would not wish to say at this moment what was then in the minds of the officials of the State Department, because it is difficult for the Senator from Michigan to analyze some of the things which have been occurring.

I think such a move was going on, beginning last September. What we saw in the various places we visited as we went around the world indicated that a movement was under way for all the nations to recognize Red China, and that we were negotiating with the other nations concerning the recognition of Red China.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator agree that finally the defense was made, "Well, we will not recognize them at this time, but we may do so when the government becomes stabilized"?

Does the Senator remember that?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. So, when we consider the entire sequence of events, does it not indicate that in the minds of those who have been directing the policy there has been a purpose in line with the statement made by the Senator from Texas, namely, that the major nations of the earth would recognize the Chinese Communists?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes. But once a nation says it will recognize a Communist government, that makes the Communist government more powerful than ever, and it becomes that much more difficult to do business with them. Under such circumstances, we find such a government taking on certain aspects of the old tribal governments.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Is not recognition of the Chinese Communist Government the perfectly logical outcome of the attitude of the Government of the United States toward Manchuria and the attitude of our Government in sending General Marshall to China in an attempt to persuade Chiang Kai-shek to take communism into his government? Is not recognition the last logical step in the process?

Mr. FERGUSON. That was Mr. Wallace's policy. Mr. Wallace returned with a report indicating—saying, in fact, in 1944—that Chiang Kai-shek could not govern any longer, that he would be "taken over" in about 60 days, that we should favor the Communists, and that the Communists would be better friends to us than the Chinese Nationalists were.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I suggest to the Senator that that policy was adopted as the official policy of the United States.

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLIKIN. So is not the recognition of that which was in effect requested, merely the logical outcome of the request?

Mr. FERGUSON. I should think so. That is why I raised my voice today on this subject, because I had, and I have, grave fear that we would not even know about it and would not have a right to say anything about it until after recognition occurred. Therefore, I think the time to debate the question of recognition or nonrecognition is now, today, so that our people may know what is going on, so that we can prevent recognition. I hope we can have a bipartisan foreign policy upon the question of recognition.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Did I correctly understand one of the Senators to say there was a Democratic caucus this morning with reference to this subject?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes. I read into the RECORD the press release from that caucus, and the able and distinguished majority leader gave his version of it.

Mr. MILLIKIN. So the opposition party has made the issue a completely partisan one, through the operation of its caucus?

Mr. FERGUSON. Of course, that is what is called the bipartisan foreign policy.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I see.

Mr. FERGUSON. It is called bipartisan foreign policy; but it is a policy after the fact.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Could it be claimed that those of us who at times have followed a bipartisan foreign policy are obligated now to abide by the action taken by the Democratic caucus of this morning?

Mr. FERGUSON. No; I really think the President of the United States released the Senate Members on this side of the aisle from following the idea of a bipartisan foreign policy when it was decided by the President to abandon the bipartisan foreign policy, as we learn that that was agreed to, judging by his hurried press release of January 5. I think that is the time when the President said to the Nation, "Here she goes out the window; this is the end of the bipartisan foreign policy. We are going to run the show from now on. We do not even want you to think we have a bipartisan foreign policy."

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I thought I heard the President of the United States say, in his message to the Congress at the recent joint session, that he hoped the bipartisan foreign policy would continue.

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; but if the Senator will recall in the press release he issued at that time he did not thank the Republicans, although as he read the address to the Congress at the joint session, he had written in it and read to the Congress a statement to the effect that he thanked the Republicans for the bipartisan foreign policy.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Then, should we thank the opposition party for its caucus of this morning?

Mr. FERGUSON. No.

Mr. President, let me say that I want debate, consultation, and agreement, as much as possible, on questions of foreign policy. I regret the fact that I saw our understanding of bipartisan go out the window. I am not regretful if the idea of the opposite party's bipartisanship, under which they did it all and we did nothing, went out the window, but I am hoping we can be taken in and given the facts, and that we can debate the issues. I do not think we have the evidence yet that that is going to happen. I think the fact that, as read into the record by the Senator from California, nothing was said about our consular property being taken over in China until after it was done, is not bipartisanship. I hope we can have genuine bipartisanship. For instance, we need it not only in matters of foreign policy, but let us say we need a bipartisan policy in connection with reducing expenditures of the Government, and lifting burdens from the shoulders of the American people. We need it there. We also need it on the foreign question. We need it in many places. In other words, we need it wherever there is right and justice. We ought to be together on the principle, but we ought to have the facts, first, in order to know whether the principle is right and just.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point, in view of the question of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The second addition to the press bulletin which came out on the Senate's teletype is one in which I think both Senators will be interested. I cannot vouch for it, except to say it comes from a responsible press association.

It reads as follows:

It was made clear by other Senators present that the State Department has assured Senate Democrats that full information regarding far eastern policy will be available to the majority party in Congress. The conference action, which was not subject to a formal vote, appeared to mean concentrated majority party counterfire to GOP charges of bankruptcy in China policy and Republican demands for Acheson's ouster.

The matter was raised at a party caucus by Senators A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, Democrat, Virginia, and RICHARD B. RUSSELL, Democrat, Georgia.

ROBERTSON, who recently lunched with Acheson at the Capitol, urged all Democrats to stand back of Mr. Truman, the Secretary, and Chairman CONNALLY of the Foreign Relations Committee.

LUCAS reported practically unanimous acceptance of ROBERTSON'S plea, except from Senator ALLEN J. ELLENDER, Democrat, Louisiana, who declared he had some doubts about Formosa's future.

Mr. FERGUSON. I appreciate the Senator's reading the press bulletin. It would seem to indicate that the Democrats not only kicked bipartisan consideration out the window, but today the majority party put it in the ashcan.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I thank the Senator from Michigan and also the distinguished junior Senator from California for the illumination they have given this subject. I have voted for certain of the so-called bipartisan measures, and I have opposed others. I am now wondering what my duty is under the present circumstances. As chairman of the Republican conference, I wonder, for example, whether I should call a Republican conference, so that we may rubber-stamp what was done by the Democratic conference this morning. That would be truly bipartisan, but I am a little bit uncertain as to whether I ought to do it.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am not only uncertain that the Senator ought to do it, but I should feel the Senator would find it a very difficult position to sustain before the minority conference. I am afraid the Senator would find that Senators would want a different kind of bipartisan foreign policy than one involving our being merely a rubber stamp. But of course, the Senator is in charge of the Republican conference, and I should be very glad to attend and to debate the issue.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The distinguished Senator anticipates that there might not be complete agreement among Republican Senators, if such a caucus were called, does he?

Mr. FERGUSON. Not only that there might not be complete agreement, but that there might be difficulty in obtaining any agreement.

Mr. MILLIKIN. As I recall, the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan has made it very clear in his talks to the Senate that in the China field there has been no bipartisan foreign policy. Is that correct?

Mr. FERGUSON. That is correct.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Bipartisan foreign policy has been rebuffed by the opposition in that field, has it not?

Mr. FERGUSON. It has.

Mr. MILLIKIN. And it was rebuffed again this morning. Is not that true?

Mr. FERGUSON. I believe it was.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I wonder how many times we have to get kicked out of that house before we conclude we are not wanted, at least so far as the Chinese situation is concerned.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator feel that any bipartisan policies were announced at Yalta before any issue was raised? Was there any bipartisan policy there?

Mr. FERGUSON. No.

Mr. WHERRY. Did the Senator know anything about the agreement at Yalta?

Mr. FERGUSON. No.

Mr. WHERRY. Did the Senator have any chance to vote on what was done at Yalta? Was it ever brought before the Senate? The Formosa situation is merely an incident in long years of secret agreements being made by men, not through the constitutional processes, under the theory that it was bipartisan foreign policy. I say to the Senator, a bipartisan policy in the settlement of the Formosa question is not enough. If we want to have a truly bipartisan foreign policy, we must go back to Yalta, start with what happened at Yalta, bring it right out into the open, and let the people of the United States of America know not only what was done there, but what has been done under other secret agreements. I ask the Senator, Will there ever be any peace in the world until the sins of Yalta are completely washed away?

Mr. FERGUSON. I am hoping we can establish a system by which both parties, on a global basis, not in Europe alone, but in Asia also, can act on a bipartisan basis. It has been established beyond any doubt that this side of the aisle has never been consulted in regard to Asia.

If we fail to draw the line, we simply launch ourselves into another series of entanglements and self-contradictions. It is a game we can only lose because we do not play ball the way the Communists do.

We will not be sacrificing our moral position in drawing a line against communism at the point of nonrecognition. The greatest morality of the moment is a strong position from which the rights of free institutions may be defended, and to which free people everywhere can look.

It has not generally been recognized, but the course of affairs in China is identical with the course of affairs in eastern Europe.

Both start from a basic understanding between the United States and Russia secretly adopted at Yalta, that the latter should have friendly governments on its borders. That friendly governments mean governments dominated by Moscow was understood by few of the people from the west. That a dilution of Communist control by democratic representation was impossible appears never to have been understood at all.

Our attitude was expressed by Sumner Welles in his book, Time for Decision. He was a high official of the State Department, and he was speaking on the subject of policy. He said:

> The Soviet Government is as legitimately entitled to promote a regional system of eastern Europe composed of cooperative and well-disposed governments in the countries adjacent to Russia as the United States has been justified in promoting an inter-American system of the 21 sovereign American Republics of the Western Hemisphere.

At Yalta, the President of the United States confirmed this line of thought when he wrote a letter to Premier Stalin on the subject of Poland. It has been little publicized. Let us see what the President said:

> I hope I do not have to assure you that the United States will never lend its support in any way to any provisional government in Poland that would be inimical to your interests.

I say now that if we are going to see that a government in Poland is not inimical to the interests of the Communist totalitarian state, then it is going to be a Communist totalitarian government.

Mr. James F. Byrnes, former Secretary of State, saw it more clearly. In his book he says the Soviet "idea of a friendly government was a government completely dominated by them." He failed to convince Molotov at Yalta that "Soviet security would be better assured by having in Poland a people who were friendly, rather than a government that was friendly only because it was dictated to by the Soviet Union."

Our way of filling out the formula for friendly governments was to insist upon free and unfettered elections, and democratic representation in the governments of eastern Europe. Quite naturally the accommodating Russians agreed to that formula. But it took Stalin, in a burst of candor at Potsdam, to puncture the whole bag of wind by remarking: "Freely elective governments in those countries will be anti-Soviet, and we can't allow that." And Stalin did not allow it. Nor did he do anything more than make a plaything of our stand for democratic representation in the eastern European governments. Ultimately we were reduced to a tiresome series of protests, which were entirely fruitless and which inspired replies which were not short of insulting to our intelligence and our dignity.

Take one typical example. The peace treaty with Rumania provided protection to all persons under Rumanian jurisdiction for the enjoyment of human rights and of the fundamental freedoms, including freedom of expression, of press and publication, of religious worship, of political opinion and public meeting.

Four months after the signing of the peace treaty the Rumanian Government dissolved the National Peasant Party and arrested its leader. The National Peasant Party and its leaders stood for the things that were in the treaty. Our Government protested this obvious violation of the treaty terms, and here is the answer we got:

> In principle the Rumanian Government cannot take into consideration observations and recommendations which would constitute acts of interference in its internal policy and which would thus be incompatible with the attributes of a free and sovereign state.

In other words, Rumania said to us that the signer of a treaty cannot protest that treaty's nonfulfillment because to do so would be an invasion of the violator's sovereignty.

What did we do? We rested the matter, for, if the United States were to press it further, it would be guilty of that imperialism for which the Communists have lampooned us in their propaganda and which we have shrunk from countering in order that we might defend a moral principle. Appeasement is our reply.

In eastern Europe we were completely bamboozled, outsmarted, and trapped until we finally attempted a policy of Communist containment which was to be the Truman doctrine and the Marshall plan.

In Asia there has been a deadly parallel, except that we have not yet drawn the line.

Mr. President, I feel that the thing which has happened to us is that Russia all the time had in mind taking over all Asia, and that in order to lull us into a sense of security she drew a red herring across the European nations so she could have full sway in Asia. We are just about to awaken from our slumber and see the false security Russia has held out.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator has mentioned communism taking over, country by country. A great many persons in the United States have the impression that Formosa is relatively a small and unimportant island off the coast of China. I think, by putting into the RECORD the State Department's own document today, we have at least demonstrated that competent persons in the State Department felt that it was a strategically located island.

I should like also to call the Senator's attention to the fact, so that the record may be clear, that, according to the World Almanac, Australia, in 1946, had a population of only 7,448,601 persons, and my latest information is that the island of Formosa, which has between six and one-half and seven million people who are natives of the island, plus the influx from the mainland, has probably as many people as are on the continent of Australia.

Mr. FERGUSON. I think that is a correct analysis, and I believe the Senator has made a very worthy contribution to the subject which we are discussing. I think the people must not lose sight of the fact that Formosa is important, as well as the fact that it represents a policy; it represents what is being done in violation of international law. If we make no issue of it we shall end up by saying nothing can be done because this question was settled at Yalta, or at Tehran, or at some other place.

Except that its premises were adopted at Yalta and were so identical with agreements for eastern Europe that they constituted a world plan, our China policy might be called the Henry Wallace plan for Asia."

Henry Wallace, it may be remembered, visited China in 1944 as Vice President of the United States. The State Department's "whitewash-paper" on China says there is no record of a report on that visit. I have reason to believe such a report exists and might be found in the archives of the Army's historical section.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I shall yield, and then I shall ask not to be interrupted until I can finish, for it is getting late.

Mr. KNOWLAND. A moment ago I put into the RECORD the total population of Australia. I wish also to put into the RECORD the figures for the population of Greece, appearing in the World Almanac and estimated for 1947. The figures are 7,450,000. Therefore, the island of Formosa has as many persons as have Greece and Australia. To Greece, as the Senator knows, we have already sent a mission, when Greece was disturbed by a domestic revolution, and at the proper time and place, on the floor of the Senate, I shall be prepared to quote from the speeches of the able chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee [Mr. CONNALLY] the importance of avoiding civil war and revolution in Greece, to show that the island of Formosa, with a population of more than seven and one-half million, is of vital importance, and that its people, as the able senior Senator from Michigan has pointed out, are entitled to some consideration before they are surrendered to the wolves of communism.

Mr. FERGUSON. I agree with the Senator. Representatives of the Formosan people have a right to sit down around a conference table with representatives of all other nations, as well as other nations have the right to sit down with us on this question.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. I wanted to get, if possible, the Senator's view upon this question: Does the able Senator from Michigan consider the territory of Formosa as being properly a part of China's territory?

Mr. FERGUSON. No; I do not. I think that under the Sino-Japanese Peace Treaty of 1895 it became part of the Japanese nation, a part of the Empire of Japan. At the close of World War II it was surrendered to the Chinese under an order from General MacArthur, and it is now held, as are other islands, until the settlement of the peace treaty.

Mr. PEPPER. The Senator recognizes as a binding and definitive document the instrument entered into between the Chinese and the Japanese after the Sino-Japanese War, and not the document entered into among the heads of Allied Powers.

Mr. FERGUSON. I think that is correct. One was a peace treaty and the other was a declaration.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the able Senator tell us, if he knows, what the attitude of Chiang Kai-shek is as to whether Formosa is a part of Chinese territory or is a part of Japanese territory?

Mr. FERGUSON. I have no idea. International law should control the matter with him as well as with us.

Mr. PEPPER. Will the Senator tell us, from his study of the subject, whether the actions of Chiang Kai-shek have indicated whether he regards Formosa as a part of Chinese territory or as a part of Japanese territory?

Mr. FERGUSON. I would think, from the evidence I found, that he had treated it as Chinese territory.

Mr. PEPPER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. FERGUSON. But I do not think that makes it right.

Mr. President, I have spoken of the Wallace report being in the archives of the Army's Historical Section. I think the nature of that report can be deduced on the basis of other evidence over Henry Wallace's signature. Its nature would be to discredit the Nationalists and Chiang Kai-shek, and to urge a flexible policy which would permit our doing business with the Communists, whom Wallace hopefully saw emerging as the postwar power in China.

The Marshall mission was the culmination of what I would call the Wallace plan in operation.

General Marshall was not sent there by Henry Wallace. He was sent there under the orders of the President of the United States.

The Marshall mission to China and the Hodges mission to Korea were for the purpose of introducing Communists in those Governments. Governments so established were to be Russia's "friendly neighbors" in the Orient. This was the basic Yalta agreement.

When the Chinese Nationalists refused to mix water and gasoline, an experiment we naively endorsed, they were written off our lists and left to shift for themselves against the tide of communism which rose from that point forward, with direct aid from Moscow.

The vicious part of the Wallace plan was that it appeared based on a desire of American officials and others to coerce or destroy Chiang Kai-shek which began to take shape in China in 1943.

The favoring of the Communists by the United States official action began in 1945 in Washington. The result was the President's statement on China policy of December 15, 1945.

The United States active intervention in China's internal affairs took place in a big way in China in 1946. The Marshall mission, under the direction of the President, tipped the scales against the Nationalists and for the Communists. From the time of the Marshall mission, when their success against the Reds was at its peak, the Nationalists began to sink sensationally.

There was a reason for that. We might consider the old seesaw, when the Nationalists were high with a big army, and the Communists were low without one, and ask why did the plans shift and why did the seesaw go where it is at this time? Our State Department says that is the reason we should do nothing.

General Marshall's embargo on exports of arms to China in August of 1946, at the very moment when the Soviet Union was effectively trying to set the Communists up in business with Japanese arms in Manchuria, upset the physical balance and the moral balance in favor of the Communists.

What did we do? We destroyed enormous amounts of Japanese military equipment in Japan which could have been sent to China for the Nationalists. The Soviet Union gave the Japanese arms to the Communists in China. We asked the Nationalists to wait, and the Communists would be able to get the arms, and bring them back and fight with the Nationalists; and the Nationalists did what was requested in order to please General Marshall and the United States.

Throughout 1946 General Marshall induced the Nationalists not to fight the Communists. This delayed the Nationalist action, which probably would have been successful at that time. He gave the Communists face, and we know what face counts for in China. He gave them opportunity, and this was carried on into 1947.

He decided against giving them Marshall plan aid. When, in 1948, the Eightieth Congress voted aid to China, both military as well as economic, the administration dragged its feet on deliveries of arms and ammunitions. I made speeches against the Nationalists. Why do I say it dragged its feet? Only last week, I think unknown even to the State Department, because I am convinced that the right hand did not know what the left hand was doing, the right hand was sending some aid under the 1948 program from New Jersey, in the United States, from our own shores, while we were saying, "Hands off" in a press release, and the administration was making speeches against the Nationalists. Finally, in 1949, in issuing the white paper when it did, it struck a terrific blow under the belt which greatly impaired the waning morale of the Nationalists and greatly strengthened the Communists.

In order to get some idea of the value of the white paper, look at the way in which Russia used it in the United Nations. One would have thought it was written expressly for them, to be used against the Nationalist Government.

How we could weigh the commitment for a friendly government involved in the Marshall mission against the certain knowledge of Russian designs, and find them canceling each other out, is the real mystery of our foreign policy. But that equation is the explanation of the Chinese puzzle.

The hands-off policy we adopted in China was reasserted in the United Nations, when we found ourselves, on December 6, 1949, voting with the Russians against a proposal to investigate Chinese charges of Russian aggression, and sponsoring a resolution which in turn would be our justification for extending the hands-off policy in Formosa.

Why did we write the white paper? It does strengthen the hands-off policy we now find being used. It was used by Russia in the United Nations.

As the President quoted it, the resolution "calls on all states to refrain from (a) seeking to acquire spheres of influence or to create foreign-controlled regimes within the territory of China; and (b) seeking to obtain special rights or privileges within the territory of China."

That was on December 9, when, according to the State Department, they knew that Russia was already exercising these very influences. By this message and by this resolution we forever cut ourselves off and say, "We will have nothing to say," even though we then knew Russia was penetrating the country, and using it as a satellite, nothing more nor less. But we are paving the road to get out. As I said before, a special note was sent to the Chinese people then indicating that we would not intervene, and we in effect said that policy had been made in October. But it was made known finally to the American people and to the world by a press release.

It is apparent from the remarks of the Secretary of State at the Press Club on January 12 that our Government knew when the resolution was offered that the Soviet Union had even then acquired this very right in Mongolia, Manchuria, and northern China. As a matter of fact, it develops that we were relying on this circumstance to cause another civil war in China so that the Soviet Union's influence might be overthrown and China might again be free from the Kremlin.

I understand from what Mr. Acheson said to the Press Club that China will one day overthrow Communist rule. Can he point to one place where this has happened without outside aid? There are those who have waited since 1919 for the Russian people to overthrow communism. Does any Senator know of one place where this has happened? I know of no such place.

Mr. MILLIKIN. It might be argued that it was overthrown in Spain.

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes, it could be argued that it was overthrown in Spain by a war, but there are those who would contend that communism was not there. I think the Senator is correct, that it was there, and it was overthrown. I stand corrected. I think there was one place.

Yugoslavia comes closest to being such a place, outside of Spain, where some would say the people came close to overthrowing communism. But that is merely a case of national communism holding an upper hand over international communism.

If Russia has not acquired a sphere of influence, a foreign-controlled regime, or special rights or privileges in the territory of China, it is beyond the understanding of any person who has read history in recent years, or the daily papers.

Yet I foresee little prospect of our pressing our resolution in the United Nations.

From its inception, before San Francisco, we have been bamboozled, outsmarted, and trapped there by the Russians. The veto principle was agreed upon at our insistence, for instance, because we foresaw a gentleman's use of that instrument. It has been used to whiplash us, and we have avoided a show-down with the whip's user because we gave it to him, and we do not want him to walk out on the game.

The time to draw a line is now. The place, as I have said earlier, is in connection with recognition.

Our Chinese policy should be considered in relation to our foreign policy as a whole. The question of recognition should be considered in relation to world problems and questions.

A decision to recognize the Communists in China would add to rather than reduce the embarrassments and perplexities regarding the great problem of peace.

If we have any hope of recapturing our moral position before it disintegrates alongside our economic and strategic position, we must assert it by a policy of nonrecognition. We will have ample legal grounds for adopting such a policy.

Recognition is purely a matter of policy. A consideration of national interest may justify one country's recognizing another, and, likewise, a consideration of national interest may justify a policy of nonrecognition.

In international law recognition is "the assurance given to a new state that it will be permitted to hold its place or rank, in the character of an independent political organism, in the society of nations." It definitely implies a diplomatic exchange.

So far as international law goes, it involves no necessary endorsement of a nation's quality or form of government. As a matter of practice, however, this technicality of the law is overlooked by lay opinion throughout the world, and recognition carries with it in the eyes of the world public generally an endorsement of the country's form. Why, otherwise, have we withdrawn our Ambassador from Franco's Spain?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Why?

Mr. FERGUSON. We did it to satisfy a few governments in Europe. We did it because we wanted to impress the world that we wanted some reform in Spain. But in this case we could say recognition does not mean that.

I have heard it stated in the cloakrooms that recognition does not technically indicate that we approve of a government, but I say public opinion does, and we certainly save the face of the nation that is recognized.

Once extended, recognition cannot be withdrawn. Diplomatic representatives may be withdrawn and diplomatic relations broken, but recognition continues.

Except for its relations in Latin America during the revolutionary years there, and certain oddities that have resulted from the aftermath of the war such as the recognition of regimes in nonexistent countries, this Nation has well-defined and well-established tests for recognition.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. Does the maintenance of an ambassador by us in Moscow imply approval of the regime in the Kremlin?

Mr. FERGUSON. It does in the eyes of the public. It does in the eyes of the Russian people.

Mr. McMAHON. Does it in the eyes of the American people?

Mr. FERGUSON. To many of them, yes. I think we have had an eye opener. I think we have found that Russia did not live up to her promises that she would not place espionage agents in this country, that she would not try to endeavor to establish her form of international government here.

Mr. McMAHON. I might say to the Senator from Michigan that he is now going somewhat far afield.

Mr. FERGUSON. No, the Senator from Michigan is not going far ahead.

Mr. McMAHON. The question is a simple one. Does the Senator believe the maintenance of an Embassy in Moscow is interpreted by our people as approval of the regime of the Kremlin?

Mr. FERGUSON. To a great extent yes, and in Russia fully.

Mr. McMAHON. I was not asking about Russia. I was asking about the people of this country. I may say to the Senator from Michigan that I think he would be with the minority. I have not taken any poll on the subject, and I presume the Senator has not either, but I certainly believe that the maintenance of diplomatic relations with Russia or with any of the countries which she dominates, is not interpreted by the majority of our people as being an act of approval of the way they have been acting in world affairs.

Mr. FERGUSON. I wish the Senator would take a poll on that question.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield so that I may propound a question to the able Senator from Connecticut who just asked the question whether the fact that we had an ambassador in Russia would be interpreted by our people as meaning that we held a friendly attitude toward that country. I wish to propound this question to the Senator from Connecticut. Why could we not send a man holding full ambassadorial rank to Spain, just as we have sent a man of full ambassadorial rank to Russia? In what respect is there a difference?

Mr. FERGUSON. I should like to answer that question by saying that the reason for withdrawing our ambassador to Spain was to impress the American people and the Spanish people with the fact that we did not agree with Franco, and therefore we did not approve of his government. So if the sending of an ambassador to Spain would mean recognition of the form of government in Spain, I think the same would apply in the case of Russia.

Mr. THYE. But I should like to have the able Senator from Connecticut answer the question whether he would recognize any specific difference between a full ambassador to Russia and a full ambassador to Spain?

Mr. McMAHON. I might say to the Senator that I do not intend to become involved in a discussion of the Spanish situation at this time. What I want to point out is simply that it has been, according to my information, the time-honored tradition of this country to have diplomatic relations with any government in the world which maintained de facto control over a sufficient period of time; in other words, which was sovereign in its own area. I think a departure from that principle is something which is not justified by our history and our precedents. To me it looks now as though a majority of the nations which acted in the General Assembly some 3 years ago in withdrawing their ambassadors from Spain, made a strategic mistake, because that is not the way, I might say to my friends, in which countries should express their approval or disapproval of a regime in another country. The ambassador is not there for the convenience of the people of the country to which we send an ambassador. He is there for our convenience. He is there as our ambassador, as our listening post. We must look at this matter, it seems to me, realistically and objectively, and add up the advantages and disadvantages to us.

I think the Senator realizes how I feel about the 14 men who are ruling Russia today, and ruling so many other hundreds of millions of people. The Senator is in no doubt as to my sentiments respecting those 14 gentlemen. At the same time I believe we are better off by having an ambassador in Moscow who can inform us to the best of his ability as to the situation there, than we would be if we did not have that listening post there.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. THYE. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut another question. I interpret his statement to mean that the State Department is really inconsistent in first recognizing Russia and sending a full-fledged ambassador to Russia, but denying the United States the right to receive the same kind of intelligent report, so to speak, from Spain by having a full-fledged ambassador in Spain. The State Department, according to the Senator's own statement, is inconsistent. I personally have somewhat the same conviction the Senator from Connecticut has expressed. It is for that reason I asked the Senator from Connecticut the question whether the State Department is not inconsistent in denying Spain a full-fledged ambassador, and at the same time assigning a full-fledged ambassador to Russia.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. I might point out to the Senator from Minnesota that we do have a chargé d'affaires, we do have a fully operating mechanism inside Spain. The Senator was present as a guest of the Foreign Relations Committee the other day and he heard the Secretary of State discuss our relations, not only in the Far East, but in western Europe as well. The session was an executive one, and I do not intend to pursue that subject any further. I simply wish to say that I do not think the present is a proper time to go into a discussion of the Spanish situation, which has many, many ramifications which cannot be understood unless many circumstances and facts are examined. I do not intend to do that extemporaneously in the process of this debate. I still say that the conception that the purpose of having an ambassador in a foreign country is to please the people of that country, is totally at variance with our history and with what I regard to be common sense. He is there in order to serve us.

The Senator can say, "If that be true, then we ought to have a full-fledged ambassador in Spain to serve us in our relations with Spain." That is a subject which I do not see at this time to be apropos. I merely again assert the fact that our Ambassador in Moscow is there for our convenience and not for the convenience of the gentlemen of the Kremlin.

Mr. FERGUSON. I wonder whether the Senator from Connecticut would answer the question as to whether he believes that Red China should be recognized.

Mr. McMAHON. I would say to the Senator that I am not prepared to come to a conclusion on that matter today. The action taken in Peiping last week certainly did not predispose me to grant recognition. After all, if it was the idea of the men who are now in control of China that we could be forced into taking action because of what they did, I think they misjudged the situation. As to what I would say 6 months or a year from now the Senator from Connecticut cannot answer the Senator from Michigan, because I do not know what the facts then may be. However, I again would like to say, if the Senator will indulge me, that we apparently have started on a long-distance talkathon upon the subject of Formosa.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator has not cut it down today.

Mr. McMAHON. I thank the Senator for his implied compliment. I have not attempted to speak at length on this subject, and perhaps, in view of the Senator's remark, I should immediately desist. I do not wish to trespass on his time. I realize the Senator has a 5-hour speech, and perhaps he should have been permitted to go through it without interruption. But I will say to the Senator again that he cannot change the fundamental facts that the future of our relations with the Soviet Government will not be affected materially by whatever happens to Formosa. That will be determined upon a different basis, upon different events, with which many of us here in the Chamber are only too familiar.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, I cannot follow the logic of the Senator with respect to our having an ambassador to one country for our convenience, and then withdrawing him to impress the people of America with the fact that we do not agree with the government of the country to which he was sent, while to another country we send an ambassador, and do so solely because it is for our convenience that he should be there, and then we find that government seizing the property occupied by the ambassador, and yet we do not withdraw him. I simply cannot follow that type of logic. But I understand that within the next few months, as the dust settles, it will become the policy to recognize Red China. There will probably be no sadder words uttered than those words of recognition.

Mr. President, I hope that America will be prepared for the news when and if the time comes that we recognize Red China. I hope we shall have debated the subject, even though it may take a number of hours. I said when I began my remarks, that I wanted, that I welcomed a debate on this important subject.

Secretary Hull in 1936 quoted an instruction dated in 1900 and which itself cited practice for over a century, as follows:

> The rule of the United States is to defer recognition of another executive * * * until it shall appear that it is in possession of the machinery of state, administering the government with the assent of the people thereof and without substantial resistance to the obligations and responsibilities incumbent upon a sovereign state under treaties and international law.

We have to look at what happened in Russia and what happened in China on the 6th of this month, and what happened in the Angus Ward case. But, Mr. President, our sad plight is that we learn from history the fact that we do not learn from history; that is the correct application of the old axiom.

The history of our recognition policy toward Soviet Russia illustrates the application of these tests. One might add that the history of our relations with Russia since recognition in 1933 proves also how unreliable can be the terms of a recognition of any Communist regime.

Secretary Hughes, in 1923, stated that the United States did not intend to recognize Soviet Russia until Russia acknowledged its liability for the debts contracted by previous governments of Russia, agreed to make restitution to American citizens whose property was confiscated, and ceased its revolutionary activity in the United States.

Mr. President, it was only a few months ago that, in New York City, there was a trial of 11 men who had been carrying on revolutionary activities in the United States of America, instigated from the Kremlin, the same Kremlin which, back in 1933, was recognized by our country under the solemn pledge that they would cease their revolutionary activities in the United States. Yet now, when our country is even considering the recognition of another Communist regime, Members of the Senate are saying on the floor of the Senate that they do not know what developments 6 months' time will bring forth. Mr. President, what have the years between 1933 and 1950 brought forth? They have brought forth nothing but absolute proof that we cannot recognize a Communist regime and be able to depend upon the terms of the recognition.

Also in 1923, President Coolidge put the case in a manner which, as I have said, should have been brought to the attention of Britain before her recognition of Red China. Britain consulted the United States of America in regard to what to do in this case. Why did not our State Department officials tell Britain what President Coolidge said in 1923? Let me refer to a conversation I had with the British Foreign Minister when I was in Britain. I was there for 1 day only; and in that connection let me point out that we find that Mr. Jessup spent only 2 days on Formosa getting "all the facts." When we were in Britain we know that Britain was going to recognize China. When we were in Hong Kong we knew that Britain was going to recognize China. But, as I have said, it is too bad that we do not have evangelists for the American way, rather than apologists for what we are doing. Oh, for someone to have called to Bevin's attention what President Coolidge said about the recognition of a Communist government. Let me read it to the Senate:

> Our Government offers no objection to the carrying on of commerce by our citizens with the people of Russia. Our Government does not propose, however, to enter into relations with another regime which refuses to recognize the sanctity of international obligations.
> I do not propose to barter away for the privilege of trade any of the cherished rights of humanity. I do not propose to make merchandise of any American principles.

Mr. President, that was good advice; that was sound logic; that was sound reasoning. That was the reason why the United States of America did not recognize Red Russia.

In 1933 President Roosevelt and Ambassador Litvinov exchanged notes in which the latter gave assurance that if the United States would recognize Russia that country would do certain things in accordance with its obligations at international law. The prime emphasis was on an assurance that Russia would not promote any subversive activity in this country. On the basis of those assurances, recognition was granted. However, at the trial of the case in April of 1949, in New York City, we had absolute proof that the Russian Government did not cease promoting subversive activities in our country, and had no intention of doing so.

Mr. President, I ask the Senate of the United States and the people of the United States, how long must we see these incidents, but pay no attention to them? How long must we know what communism stands for, but pay no attention to it?

Let us go back in history a little, to the time when Hitler wrote Mein Kampf. In that book he told the world exactly what he wanted to do. Did we pay any attention to it? No, Mr. President—not until it was too late, not until we had gotten into the Second World War.

Joe Stalin has written his intentions and his policy in a manner that all the world can see, in a way that everyone can read. Yet some of the Members of the Senate are blind to what he has written, and do not understand what communism is. Mr. President, until we understand these things, we shall become involved in inconsistencies, in trouble, and in wars.

On the basis of the legal tests which we have established, and on the basis of our experience with Communist governments for the past 17 years, I am of the firm opinion that from this time forward we should grant no recognition to any Communist regime.

Our experience with Communist regimes proves conclusively, beyond reasonable doubt, that we cannot expect anything but substantial resistance to obligations and responsibilities under treaties and international law.

The files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation on the activities of diplomats and others coming from Communist nations who have diplomatic immunity should show—and I say will show—our State Department what we can expect a Chinese Communist embassy, so far as espionage and subversive activities are concerned. I take it that those files are open to the Secretary of State and to others in the State Department, so that they may read what is contained in them. I say they will prove conclusively what will happen if we recognize another Communist regime. Certainly we can expect no reciprocity whatsoever in the exchange of diplomatic representatives. There is no quid pro quo with Communists.

To have diplomatic intercourse with a Communist regime is merely to lift the iron curtain long enough for it to be dropped a few yards from the Embassy door. Senators should read General Bedell Smith's statement about how he was treated while he was our Ambassador to Russia. I once spent some time with a British Ambassador, discussing how the British were treated in Moscow. Anyone who has discussed that matter with one who has spent any time in Moscow as a diplomat, knows that the iron curtain is pulled down right beside the door of the Embassy; and anyone who leaves the Embassy to go outdoors there, can do so only when under Russian guard.

Since our municipal laws do not allow the restrictions upon movement and activity to which our diplomats behind the iron curtain are accustomed, recognizing a Communist regime means, in our case, setting loose within this country a new horde of espionage agents cloaked with diplomatic immunities and privileges. Their activities are flagrant violations of international law, against which we are almost wholly powerless to guard.

Following such recognition, we can only expect further outrages of mistreatment against persons and property, in violation of international law, as represented by the treatment of Angus Ward; of the two downed American fliers in China, Meschter and Willis; of the two ship's officers who were kidnaped and taken to Korea; and the treatment of our businessmen in Hungary.

From Red China we can expect no regard for the treaties made with China, for the new regime denies that it is the successor of the Republic of China.

Here is what our State Department said in regard to the seizure of American consular property in Peking on January 13, 1950:

> This violation of consular property has arisen in almost immediate sequence to the harsh and unjustified treatment of the United States Consular General, Angus Ward, and his staff at Mukden. It also is one in a long series of mistreatment of Americans which includes the beating of Vice Consul Olive in Shanghai and the continued detention of Messrs. Smith and Bender, United States naval personnel.

Mr. President, let all of us consider those incidents. Let us realize that all the facts about the Angus Ward case are known by our officials, for he has returned to the United States. I had the privilege of talking to him today. I was trying to understand why China would do such a thing, why China would seize our property the day following our saying we would not defend Formosa. Mr. President, do you know why the Chinese Communists acted that way? They did so because they wanted to demonstrate, for political, propaganda purposes, "We have a strong government in China. We, the Communists, can stand up to the big United States, and we can say to it, 'You cannot appease us. We won't recognize the fact that you say you will not help Communist China. We are going to tell you, big America, where your place is. We are going to take over your consular property'." And they did take it over.

What shall we do about it? What we did when Mr. Ward, in Mukden, was asked whether he had the title to certain property there in his possession? He replied, "No, I am only an administrative officer, the titles would be in Washington," to which the Communists replied, "If you do not have the titles, we will take them over." Let us consider the Ward case. Is it something new? It has gone on for 14 months. Mr. Ward was put behind the iron curtain. He was detained for 13 months, while at the same time the United States of America was carrying on, sending ships into Shanghai. How are we to expect a consular agent to feel when he is imprisoned, and when his Government is not doing anything about it, but when, in fact, his Government is trading with the enemy of its own people? Why did the Communists do it? They did it to defy big America. They did it for propaganda purposes. All over China, wherever it was possible to circulate the story, the Chinese people were told "America is the imperialist, who has agents in this country." How did they do this? They put Ward in prison, and then, let us imagine, they put in the Chinese newspapers that he was the head of the espionage agents in China for capitalist America. Did they ever try him on that charge? No, except after he was leaving.

Let me cite the facts. They did not have a case against Ward as being an espionage agent. They could not put him on trial on that charge. But the stooges of the Kremlin trumped up a case against him. Oh, yes; they hoped Ward would break down, after 28 days in prison, when the frost was on the windows and when he had on only a suit of clothes. For 28 long days he remained in prison. Thank God, he was a character who would not sign a confession in order to obtain his release. It was offered to him the easy way, many times. Mr. Ward comes from Michigan. Men of Michigan are made of firmer stuff than to give the Communists a confession, which in this case would have been absolutely false, to back up their propaganda. Mr. Ward had spent 14 years in Soviet Russia. He knew what to expect. He knew when he was put in prison what they would try to do in order to obtain a confession. But he and his chief man stood up and said, "No." If death came, death would have to come, but he was not going to sell America short for Communist propaganda purposes. Does he believe that Mao is a Tito? No. No; these people are trained in Russia. They know nothing but the Russian method. Everything that was done in relation to his trial was identical with what would happen in Russia and with what has happened in Russia. The attempt to obtain confessions proceeded. The confession of the Italian who was in our embassy, absolutely false as it was, bolstered up their propaganda. They even got a Japanese to confess, though the confession was later repudiated by him. Then what did they do? They could not press the espionage charge against Ward. They put him in prison and tried him for assault and battery alleged to have been committed upon a Chinese servant. The case had been trumped up from beginning to end. All the men were tried. I wish I could relate graphically how it all happened, how efforts were made to wring confessions from them. The prisoners had no counsel at the trial, no right to ask questions, no right to contradict anyone. The man who had conducted the efforts to obtain a confession from Ward sat as one of the three judges during the trial. He sat at a desk, holding a paper on which questions were written. He held them in a newspaper, so they could not be seen. He asked slanting questions; for example, "What did you do?" Or "Did you not do this, after you beat this man?" They have learned that technique from us. We can remember the question, "When did you quit beating your wife?" It is the same technique.

What did they do? They found everyone in the embassy guilty of assault and battery and ordered them deported. There were three Russians working for our embassy. They were found guilty. Were they deported? No. Immediately after the conviction, when it was learned that three Russians had been convicted and ordered deported, their consular agent called and had the sentence stayed or rescinded, so far as the three Russians were concerned. That is the way they do business. What a great lift it gave those few Russians there. Let me say, what a great lift it gave to the trained Communists. Their men were out. The sentence was set aside so far as they were concerned. It was told to all the Chinese people, "Russia is our aid, our assistant." The Communists are in China for the sole purpose of delivering to the Communists the goods, chattels, and wealth of China.

Mr. Acheson feels that eventually the Chinese will overthrow the Communist regime. I do not want to wait that long. I think we ought to give the moral support we can. Then what did they do with Ward? After he was convicted in the assault case, which was trumped up, he was tried in absentia on the espionage charge, and they found him guilty. They found him guilty of being the top espionage agent for all the capitalistic nations. He was tried without being present or being allowed to call any witnesses in his behalf. He was deported together with all the other defendants in the case. The charge against him was made for propaganda effect on the minds of the people.

Our State Department could not see what went on in the Ward case. It could not see exactly what was going on in the consular case, on the 13th of December.

Mr. President, if the facts stated do not prove that this Communist nation should never be recognized by the United States of America, what proof does the United States of America need? Angus Ward is a witness to the fact, and our State Department knows his testimony to be true. I say we cannot expect Red China to recognize any international law.

For all these reasons we must not abandon our historic tests and recognize any Communist regime in the future. But there is another and more impelling reason for withholding recognition from Red China.

Nonrecognition of Red China would be the first step in putting an end to the appeasement policies we have entered so blindly, time after time, in recent years. These policies have led us out on one limb after another as we have sought to hold up our end of a bad bargain, while the Communists have scooted off into the night.

It would be a reassertion of that determination to place right above might which had a parallel application in the Stimson doctrine of not recognizing the fruits of territorial aggression, and which did so much to bring America of age and elevate it in the eyes of men the world over.

It would be a beacon of light for all the people of southeast Asia who are hopefully looking to us for some signal that we expect them to hold the line against communism. It would be the first step in regaining our dignity and strength before a world which is alarmed to see us jump when the Communists pull the string. It would reverse years of bamboozlement, trapping, and outsmarting. It would be late, but, I hope, not too late.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I should like to ask the able Senator from Michigan whether he is familiar with the article which appeared in the New York Herald Tribune this morning, entitled "Must General Bradley Testify?" and written by Mr. Walter Lippmann? Mr. Lippmann is normally a very competent and very observant reporter, but he apparently received some misinformation. He indicates that there has been a suggestion on the part of Senators that, when Secretary Johnson and General Bradley appear before the Foreign Relations Committee, they appear in a public session. I certainly know of no Senator who has made any suggestion, in connection with the taking of testimony dealing with the strategic defense of the country, that either Mr. Johnson or General Bradley testify in public. But there has been a demand that the Senate of the United States, through its Foreign Relations Committee, and the House, through its Committee on Foreign Affairs, ascertain whether the State Department was given advice to the effect that Formosa had no strategic value. That is an entirely different suggestion from the one outlined by Lippmann this morning.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from Michigan has never heard anyone even suggest that those witnesses be heard in public.

OUR BIPARTISAN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. JENNER. Mr. President, every day that passes confronts us with mounting evidence to prove that our bipartisan foreign policy has been, and continues to be, a gigantic hoax.

For the past several days, this evidence has derived from the discussions on the Senate floor of the debacle which our pro-Communist State Department policy has brought about in China.

Even the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan now has admitted that the Republicans on the Foreign Relations Committee have never been consulted.

The senior Senator from New Jersey, also a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, has gone so far as to admit that he felt himself, "An unwelcome meddler in a policy that had already been determined."

Certainly, the recent antics of the Secretary of State, during his secret testimony before the Foreign Relations Committees of both Houses of Congress, and his refusal to discuss the role which our national defense officials have played in determining our disastrous policy in the Far East, are added proof of how vicious a hoax our so-called bipartisan policy really is.

Even the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has admitted that such evidence is "indispensable."

I am informed that at long last the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has been overruled and that the committee has voted to ask the Joint Chiefs of Staff to testify on these matters on January 26.

Yet, confronted as these men are by the "gag rule" that has been imposed on members of the armed services, our chances of getting a realistic picture that deviates from the official line are slim indeed, particularly since the Democratic Members have caucused and have determined that that will be the official line.

This afternoon, however, I want to bring to the attention of the American people additional proof of how the bipartisan foreign policy continues to betray their vital interests, not only in the Pacific, but in Europe as well.

Mr. President, I refer to the fact that at this very moment our policies toward the defeated peoples in central Europe are making a mockery of every single one of the European programs into which we have entered since the end of the war, and which we are continuing to finance.

To be more specific, I refer to the continued dismantling of the peacetime industrial potential of the German people.

I want to ask my colleagues in the Senate, more particularly my colleagues of either party who are members of the Foreign Relations Committee, when they have ever been formally consulted on or when they have ever formally endorsed this dismantling program either before or since its inception?

I am convinced the record will show that at no time has the Senate of the United States either been consulted, or given any opportunity whatever to participate in the formulation, the endorsement, and the carrying out of this policy, which today, 5 years after the war is over, at the continued expense of the American taxpayer, continues to gnaw at the economic vitals of German and European recovery.

Think of it, Mr. President. The same Department of State officials, who have been responsible for the calamity we confront in the Far East, are also responsible for the origin and the continued suicidal destruction of this dismantling program which is being forced on the German people.

What more convincing evidence could be found to discredit our bipartisan policy as a gigantic hoax, than the following?

In the first place, Mr. President, this senseless destruction of the economic potential, which is so desperately needed for the maintenance of even a minimum standard of living, is costing the American taxpayers $1,000,000,000 a year.

In the face of our so-called all-out anti-Communist cold war this policy of vengeance now constitutes a dagger of treason that is being twisted in the back of the Marshall plan, ECA's integration of the European economy, the Truman doctrine, and the North Atlantic Pact.

What is even more outrageous, Mr. President, is the disposition of these plants which are being destroyed.

The industrial potential which they represent continues to be allocated behind the iron curtain, bolstering the Russian designs against the west, because Britain is continuing to ship material through the British zone to the east and because Czechoslovakia and Albania, who are nothing but Stalin's stooges, continue to sit as members of the inter-Allied reparations agencies in Brussels, and continue to function as the regular recipients of Germany's industrial potential, with the American taxpayer continuing to foot the bill.

Think of it, Mr. President. Today, 5 years after the end of the war, this senseless policy of destruction is continuing to go on without its ever having been presented to the United States Senate for consideration.

This senseless destruction continues in spite of the fact that, first, it is in plain violation of the directives for the treatment of captured enemy property which are contained in the training manual for military officers in the Charlottesville (Va.) Officer's Training School of the United States Army.

Second, this senseless destruction is in direct violation of the plain mandate of the Constitution that captured enemy property is the property of the United States Government and the President has not the authority to give away even a toothpick.

Third, Mr. President, this senseless destruction and confiscation of Germany's industrial potential is in violation of the provisions of the international law which were written at The Hague Conference of 1908 for the specific protection of the private property of defeated people against confiscation by the victors.

I would remind my colleagues and the American people that these provisions of The Hague Conference are the basis of international law that protects the concept of private property upon which our own social and economic system is based.

Fourth, this senseless destruction continues in spite of the fact that, suicidal as they were, the provisions of the infamous Yalta agreement at least put a 2-year time limit on savage policies of destruction.

Fifth, Mr. President, this senseless destruction continues in violation of the revised provisions of the Potsdam agreement which put a February 2, 1948, dead line on dismantling.

Sixth, even though the Congress of the United States has never been consulted in the formulation of this policy, and has sought indirectly to exercise some control over its continuation, by the appointment of special committees to study the matter, the records show, Mr. President, that the basic recommendations of the Colmer committee, of the Hoover committee, of the Kennan committee, of the Wolfe committee, and of the Humphrey committee itself have been flouted or ignored.

Seventh, Mr. President, the continuation of this senseless destruction has been carried on in violation of the specific promises and pledges of the administration representatives that the whole question of German dismantlement, if left in their hands, would be determined by the sole consideration of the greatest contribution the dismantling program could make to the reconstruction of the European economy.

Mr. President, I want to emphasize the following charges to prove that the administration has had no intention whatever of accounting for the actions it has taken or the policy it has pursued in this field since it began.

I have been informed that there is not in existence today any formal list of end uses to which dismantled German industrial potential has been put on the other side of the iron curtain, although we know that Russia has collected nearly $14,000,000,000 in reparations.

There is not in existence a single formal list of the end uses to which this dismantling equipment has been put on this side of the iron curtain.

This means that today there is no way by which a United States Senator can hold this administration to account for the economic insanity, the terrifying waste and destruction that has followed in the wake of this dismantling insanity.

There is not in existence today, Mr. President, a single list even of those plants that have been partially destroyed, to implement the so-called prohibited industrial agreement of last April.

There is not in existence, to my knowledge, Mr. President, not only a single reliable list of plants that have been dismantled for reparations, but there is no list of those which have been turned over to other nations under a so-called policy of "restitution."

Eighth, Mr. President, this senseless process of destruction continues to go on and is excused on the basis of the plea, that "it is in the clean-up stage," which is merely another way of giving the same men who have been responsible in the past blanket power to drag this destruction on indefinitely into the future.

For instance, I am informed that licenses to operate have been denied many of those plants that have been removed from the reparations list.

Mr. President, on October 17, 1949, Senate Resolution 187 was submitted on the Senate floor following a bipartisan petition of 44 Senators to the President stating that it was the sense of the Senate that the Secretary of State be requested to ask President Truman to review this whole dismantling problem.

There were two resolutions, as a matter of fact. Senate Resolution 187 was submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND]. That Senate resolution is still pending. It was promised an early hearing by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I wish to ask now, has anything been done with regard to this resolution?

It was at the insistence of the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee that this resolution was referred to the Foreign Relations Committee, and, as I have said, it was sidetracked, and remains undisposed of.

On November 24, following the adjournment of Congress, a sop was thrown to the Senate by the Department of State, in the form of concessions embodied in the Bonn agreement, by which twenty-odd plants were removed from the reparation list in exchange for the new German Government's agreement to hasten the destruction of all the other 100-odd plants that remained to be dismantled.

In other words, Mr. President, the Department of State used the threat of continuing dismantlement to force the new German Government to agree to a policy that would destroy jobs for German workers, impoverish German families, undermine the already shaky economic foundations of the German people, and play directly into the hands of Communist propaganda.

As a result, Mr. President, on December 6, 1949, the European branch of the Office of International Trade, in the Department of Commerce, issued a pamphlet titled "Reparation News," a copy of which I hold in my hand.

This document states:

The Interallied Reparations Agency has announced that 138 German war and industrial plants containing general-purpose equipment adaptable for peacetime production will be allocated as reparation among the western allied nations, including the United States, in the near future, according to the information received by the Office of International Trade, Department of Commerce.

Think of it, Mr. President, 138 plants containing "general-purpose equipment adaptable for peacetime production" still had not been allocated to other nations.

As of this very moment, Mr. President, the German section of the Department of State has not the slightest notion of the stages of dismantlement to which this policy of destruction has been pushed, or of the present status of this list of 138 plants which are "adaptable to peacetime production."

And this outrageous policy continues to go on in Germany, Mr. President, in spite of the fact that on May 12, 1949, Gen. Frank R. McCoy issued a unilateral statement in which the United States repudiated its Japanese reparation program, and put an end to an identical policy of senseless destruction in Japan.

This action was taken, Mr. President, in spite of the violent opposition of other members of the Far Eastern Commission who were scheduled to be recipients of additional Japanese industrial potential.

I call attention to this matter because I believe the conduct of our foreign relations, as revealed by the handling by the Department of State of our foreign relations both in the Far East and in Europe, conclusively demonstrates how this administration has used the fraudulent slogan of bipartisan cooperation to usurp the basic policy-determining and treaty-making power of the United States Senate to silence all criticism, to strangle all opposition, and to make and break foreign commitments, in the name of the United States Government and of the American people, without having to be responsible to anyone.

What more proof do my colleagues need than that I have just presented to them, to enlist them in support of a move to put an end to this senseless policy of destruction in Germany, and restore some semblance of sanity to our dealings not only with a defeated people, but with the European peoples as a whole before it is too late?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the documents from which I have quoted be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY GEN. FRANK R. MCCOY, UNITED STATES REPRESENTATIVE ON THE FAR EASTERN COMMISSION, CONCERNING JAPANESE REPARATIONS AND LEVEL OF INDUSTRY

The Japanese reparations problem has been one of the most important and pressing questions with which the Far Eastern Commission and its member countries have had to deal. The United States, on its part, has taken a long and continuing interest in this problem and has been keenly aware of the interest of the other FEC countries in finding a reasonable solution to it. It is to be regretted that this controversial issue which for such a long time has proved incapable of solution by this Commission continues to retard the achievement of economic self-support by Japan, which is so greatly in the interest of our common objectives with respect to that country.

In our discussions of the matter here in the Commission we have proceeded from the agreement contained in the Potsdam Declaration that reparations would be exacted from Japan and that they should be in a form which would not impair the ability of the Japanese people to support themselves. From the earliest days of the Far Eastern Commission the United States has been guided by a desire that the victims of Japan's aggression receive as reparations such of Japan's resources as was possible without jeopardizing Japan's ability to meet its own peaceful needs. The United States has felt, further, that in order that the nations devastated by Japan might receive reparation while their need was greatest, in order that there might be removed from the mind of the Japanese Government and people uncertainty regarding the reparations question, and in order that as many as possible of Japans' postwar obligations might be disposed of during the period of the occupation, a reparations program should be worked out and put into effect at the earliest practical moment.

These factors led the United States Government to take the initiative in making a number of policy proposals to the Far Eastern Commission. In April 1946, the United States submitted to the Far Eastern Commission a pattern of proposals providing that there should be made immediately available for reparations designated quantities of industrial facilities which were at that time considered to be clearly surplus to Japan's peaceful needs. Between May and December of that year the Commission adopted a series of interim reparations policy decisions based upon these United States proposals, but the subsequent inability of the Commission to agree on a schedule of shares for division of the facilities among the claimant countries prevented implementation of the decisions. In April 1947, the United States Government offered further proposals, which would have had the effect of making known to Japan precisely, and on a final basis, what industrial capacity should be considered by that country to be immune from removal as reparations and what should be eligible for removal. In the same month, the United States because of its desire to work toward a settlement of this matter issued an advance transfers intrim directive, under authority granted in paragraph III, 3, of the terms of reference of the Far Eastern Commission, instructing the supreme commander to effect delivery to four of the FEC countries of 30 percent of the facilities which the Far Eastern Commission itself had previously determined in the interim removals decisions to be available for reparations removal. Issuance of this directive was motivated in part by a desire to assist those countries which had in the course of fighting against Japan's aggression on their own territory suffered most grievously, but it was also motivated by a desire to prompt FEC countries to agree upon a reparations program from which all 11 countries might benefit.

In November 1947 the United States Government took the initiative once more in an effort to end the stalemate within the Commission on the question of reparations shares, a stalemate which continued to make it impossible for any of the Commission's decisions on the reparations problem to take practical effect. This United States proposal contained the provision that if the Far Eastern Commission countries would accept the schedule of percentages which had been worked out by the United States Government—on the basis of prolonged exchanges of views among Commission members as to the equities involved—the United States Government, on its part, would make available an important part of its own share for distribution among the countries which could accept the United States proposal as a whole. Sixteen months have passed, and this proposal has not been accepted by the Commission.

I should like to emphasize at this point that the action of my Government, and, it is assumed, of the other member governments, in participating in the policy decisions which have been taken by the Commission on the question of reparations was predicated upon two basic assumptions, namely, that the resources to be removed from Japan as reparations were clearly excess to the peaceful needs of a self-supporting Japanese economy and that there would be a shares schedule acceptable to and agreed upon by the Far Eastern Commission countries which would determine in what proportions available reparations should be divided.

As I have already stated, and as the Commission well knows, the second of these assumptions has not been realized and there seems little prospect of its being realized. As regards the first assumption, that reparations removals should be limited to facilities clearly excess to the needs of a self-supporting Japanese economy, successive studies during the past 18 months of Japan's future industrial requirements have necessitated progressive upward adjustments of earlier estimates of these requirements. The first of these studies was that of Overseas Consultants, Inc., whose report was made available to the Commission on March 2, 1948, and the second was that of the so-called Johnston committee, whose report was made available to the Commission on May 19, 1948. Both of these reports came to the sober conclusion that the quantity of capital equipment in Japan which could be properly considered in excess of Japan's peaceful needs had been greatly overestimated. Both reports indicated that for a variety of reasons the Japanese economy was continuing to operate at a heavy deficit even though living standards remained at a minimum level, and that the end to these deficits is not in sight. The evidence contained in these reports and the common knowledge of all Far Eastern Commission countries leads to the inescapable conclusion that the Japanese economy can be made to bear additional economic burdens, beyond those directly related to meeting its own requirements, only by prolonging or increasing the staggering costs borne by the American taxpayer.

The United States has, since the time of the Japanese surrender, carried the burden of preventing such disease and unrest in Japan as might jeopardize the purposes of the occupation. The critical economic conditions with which, it is now apparent, Japan is faced, and the prospect of continuing deficits in Japan's international payments for some years to come, render measures of Japanese economic recovery of utmost importance. It is inescapable that if the basic purposes of the occupation are to be achieved, the Japanese people must be enabled to support themselves at a tolerable standard of living. No one could reasonably suggest that Japan should be abandoned to economic despair. So to abandon Japan would be to undo the costly victory in the Pacific.

I am sure that other Commission countries agree with my Government that the Japanese people themselves must exert maximum efforts for the attainment of recovery. For some months the United States Government has explored means whereby this objective could best be achieved. In issuing its directive of December 10 regarding Japan's economic stabilization, the United States Government took a major step toward requiring the Japanese people to exert their utmost energies in stabilizing their economy and reducing their dependence for subsistence on foreign subsidy. Under present circumstances in Japan the cost of dismantling, packing, and transporting reparations facilities would conflict with the program of Japan's economic stabilization and would constitute an additional financial burden upon the United States Government. I do not wish to emphasize this point unduly, but the United States Government would be lacking in candor if it did not point out that the resources at its disposal to meet demands from all parts of the world are limited.

It is now apparent to the United States Government that the first as well as the second of the two basic assumptions mentioned earlier, assumptions which underlay the policy decisions of the FEC having to do with reparations and are a precondition for an FEC reparations program, has not been realized. This fact has led my government to several conclusions. Before stating them, however, I wish to emphasize that the United States Government maintains fully and categorically its support of the principle adopted by the Far Eastern Commission that Japan's war-making capacity should be eliminated. As you know, all of Japan's specialized war-making facilities have been destroyed. The United States Government believes that all other equipment used for war purposes in the past should, if retained in Japan, be fully converted to the purposes of and utilized in Japan's peaceful economy. Where this cannot be done, the United States Government believes that such equipment should be scrapped. The United States will not permit difficulties in reaching a solution of the reparations problem to be a means whereby Japan's war capacity might reemerge.

It may not be amiss at this point to recall that Japan has already been deprived not only of all of its overseas territorial possessions, but also of substantial quantities of real property of Japanese ownership and origin in the former possessions and elsewhere abroad. This property constitutes a large payment which the Japanese have already made toward satisfaction of their reparations obligations. Unfortunately, from the standpoint of equity, some countries have benefited more than others in the reparations that they have obtained in this form. However, from the standpoint of Japan, the loss of these properties, whatever the proportions in which they happen to have been distributed, drastically reduces Japan's ability to support even at a minimum level the needs of its people.

In view of the above considerations, the United States is forced to the following conclusions:

(a) The deficit Japanese economy shows little prospect of being balanced in the near future, and to achieve eventual balance, will require all resources at its disposal.

(b) The burden of removing further reparations from Japan could detract seriously from the occupation objective of stabilizing the Japanese economy and permitting it to move toward self-support.

(c) There is little or no prospect of Far Eastern Commission agreement on a reparations shares schedule despite the repeated initiatives by the United States over the past 3 years to assist the Commission in reaching such an agreement. Without agreement on a shares schedule the existing Far Eastern Commission policy decisions regarding reparations are incapable of implementation.

(d) Japan has already paid substantial reparations through expropriation of its former overseas assets, and in smaller degree, under the advance transfer program.

In light of these conclusions the United States Government is impelled to rescind its interim directive of April 4, 1947, bringing to an end the advance transfer program called for by that directive. It is impelled also to withdraw its proposal of November 6, 1947, on Japanese reparations shares, and I am so informing the Secretary General. Finally, the United States Government takes this occasion to announce that it has no intention of taking further unilateral action under its interim directive powers to make possible additional reparations removals from Japan.

I earlier stated my Government's belief that maximum efforts should be exerted by the Japanese themselves for their economic recovery. It is the view of the United States that all facilities, including so-called primary war facilities, present designated as available for reparations which can contribute to Japanese recovery should be utilized as necessary in Japan's peaceful economy for recovery purposes.

With regard to primary war facilities, all of which as I earlier stated were some time ago stripped of their special-purpose equipment and thus of their war facilities characteristics, it is the view of the United States that SCAP, under the authority granted in paragraph 10 of the FEC decision on reduction of Japanese industrial war potential, should as rapidly as practicable require the dismantlement, dispersion, or other action for the utilization in Japan's peaceful economy of such of these facilities as are required to meet the needs of the occupation, which needs prominently include economic recovery. Remaining primary war facilities should continue to be protected, in the sense of preventing loss or scrapping of individual items, pursuant to the above-mentioned FEC decision requiring their impounding.

Impounding does not, however, include requirement that the facilities be kept in their present locations or that the Japanese devote resources to preserve their value or maintain them in working order.

The United States, it will be recalled, has repeatedly clarified its understanding that the "level of industry" proposals before the Commission, excepting those levels which will lapse by FEC decision on October 1, 1949, had application only to the question of the quantities of industrial facilities which could be spared for reparations, and had no bearing on the matter of future levels of industrial capacity in Japan. Turning now to this latter question, I have already emphasized my Government's support of the principle that Japan's capacity to make war should not be permitted to re-emerge. It is the considered view of the United States Government that this objective does not require that Japan's production for peaceful purposes be limited or that limitations be imposed on levels of Japanese productive capacity in industries devoted to peaceful purposes. This belief, coupled with the evidence of Japan's present economic plight and the difficult problems Japan will face in future in attaining levels of industrial production and foreign trade sufficient to support its people even at minimum levels, render it clearly advisable in my Government's view that Japan be permitted to develop its peaceful industries without limitation. The problem facing us is not one of limitation of Japan's peaceful industries but of reviving these industries to provide the people's barest wants.

The United States Government plans shortly to submit to the FEC for its consideration proposals for the rescission or amendment of existing and pending FEC reparations and level of industry policy papers so as to bring FEC policies on these matters, should the proposals be approved by the Commission, into conformity with the position which I have set forth. My Government earnestly hopes that the other member governments will appreciate the considerations underlying this position and will be able to concur in the new United States proposals.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. HICKENLOOPER was excused from attendance on the sessions of the Senate for the remainder of this week.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HENRY H. ARNOLD, GENERAL OF THE AIR FORCES

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am sure that I express the feelings of the Members of this body in voicing deep regret over the death on Sunday in California of the General of the Air Forces, Henry H. Arnold.

"Hap" Arnold entered the Army Air Service in its very infancy, when it possessed two airplanes. He literally grew up with the Service and with aviation. He was one of the pioneers who first saw the tremendous possibilities of air power, and he worked tirelessly through the years for its recognition and its development.

When World War II came "Hap" Arnold was ready. His dynamic leadership and his guiding genius developed and led the mighty Army Air Force that took such a terrific toll of our enemies, and did so much to make possible and to hasten our victory. The Air Force he built stands guard over our shores today.

Henry Arnold devoted his life to the cause of America. He will stand in history alongside the great captains of our Nation. He has gone to join them and the choice and master spirits of the ages.

Mr. President, I ask to have printed at this point in the RECORD an address which I delivered at the testimonial dinner of the Army Air Forces to General Arnold, at the Statler Hotel, Washington, D. C., February 9, 1946, on the occasion of General Arnold's retirement from the Army Air Forces.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We gather tonight to do honor to an old comrade, a great soldier, a great air man, a great military leader, a great servant of our country, Gen. Hap Arnold.

His is the story of the achievements of an American boy who was to rise step by step until he was to stand within the small and select company of the leaders who were to save our country and the liberties of all peoples. His is the story of the man who did the impossibles.

We see Hap Arnold a lanky young second lieutenant graduating at West Point in 1907, winning Aviator's Certificate No. 29 in 1911, winning the first of all United States military aviation badges in 1912, and in that same year being the first Army officer to have his name inscribed on the Mackay Trophy.

World War I comes and he does well his part. In 1935 he wins for the second time the Mackay Trophy, and in 1938 brings the Collier Trophy to the Army Air Corps.

And then World War II, the greatest war in all the world's history. Hap Arnold is full grown now with his splendid personal leadership, driving spirit and professional genius. His unerring vision grasped the picture and his sound judgment correctly estimated the situation. In his brain the eagles of battle built their eyries, and beginning almost from scratch without a precedent, without a pattern, he created the mightiest military machine of the air the world has ever known. He smashed precedent, he cut the lines of static thought, he did the needful and built anew. He demanded from his subordinates, from science, from industry and labor, from all America, twice as much as it appeared humanly possible to deliver. He got at least 50 percent more than anyone, except Hap Arnold, expected to get. His driving spirit, the driving spirit of the Army Air Forces found translation in their motto, "It Can Be Done."

In 1940, we had to get aircraft to England—not a few but a veritable flood of them. There was not sufficient shipping space to make even a start. Hap Arnold mused, "Airplanes are made to fly. We will fly them to England."

Oh, it could not be done; everybody except Hap Arnold knew that. It was a long way to England. The route lay across the icy wastes of the North Atlantic. There were no intermediate landing fields, no communications, no weather services. The percentage of losses would be terrible to contemplate. Maybe a few long-range bombers could make it in a few of the better days during the summer. But it was just impossible.

A few months afterwards, Hap Arnold was to report to a committee of Congress, "We did fly the planes, pursuits as well as bombers, to England, and during the winter with the same success as we did in the summer, with no greater losses."

American and allied experts assured Hap Arnold that daylight, high-altitude precision bombing was impractical and impossible. Our allies had tried and had given up. Theoretically and demonstratedly it could not be done. We could not possibly break through German defenses without prohibitive losses. Even the Germans were convinced. But Hap Arnold knew that to win the war we had to go through, and we know how well and how often we went through in broad open daylight straight to the targets.

The general had to have fighters to accompany the heavy bombers over Germany. A young staff officer remembers vividly walking to his desk one morning and finding there a directive for a fighter aircraft that would escort heavy bombers from England to Berlin and return. The general wanted it in less than 6 months, and from the assembly lines came pouring the Thunderbolts and the Mustangs. When the first fighters accompanied the heavy bombers over Germany and Nazi pilots reported them, the Nazi high command laughed and said that the pilots were seeing things. They said it was impossible for a fighter to fly that far, until one day the commanding general of the Nazi fighters went out to take a look at the air war and met four American Mustangs which chased him all the way back to Berlin. Then he knew how far the American long-range fighters could fly.

The European winter came with its wretched weather and our air operations were coming almost to a standstill. The general's answer was to find out how to bomb through the overcast. He rallied the world's scientists and forced the solution. Soon our thousand-plane attacks were as regular in bad weather as in good. With our fancy radar and radio gadgets our planes were able to drop their bombs on the enemy almost as precisely as if they were seeing the targets.

There was often a scarcity of many of the critical materials needed for the building of our planes and their equipment. These materials were in demand by other leaders no less conscientious or patriotic who were carrying grave responsibilities. It was the driving spirit of Hap Arnold that made all appreciate the vast importance of his great bombing offensives, won the approval of the President and secured from the Joint Chiefs of Staff the overriding priority to meet his needs.

Great as were the planes that Hap Arnold built, he recognized that their effectiveness against the enemy depended upon who serviced and navigated and piloted and fought them. He realized that 65 percent of the Air Forces enlisted personnel and practically all of its officers had to be technical specialists. He demanded that the Air Forces have only the best in officers and personnel. He got them. From the flower of American youth came his mechanics, his pilots, and his fighting airmen. They paid tremendous dividends.

When the war broke with such swiftness there was an insistent demand that Hap Arnold send all available trained personnel to stem the engulfing tide of enemy air power. He was too wise for this. He refused to hazard the future to serve the hour. He sent only a portion. With the remainder as a teaching nucleus he welded together the mighty Army Air Forces that whipped its weight in Messerschmitts, Folke-Wulffs, and Mitsubishis. It was a tough decision. It was the right decision.

With his planes and his fighting airmen Hap Arnold carried the war to the very heart of Germany long before it was possible to land on the beaches of Normandy. Where Hitler and Goering with all their planes and stratagems and all their vaunted Luftwaffe failed, Hap Arnold succeeded. While Hitler and Goering could not understand and appreciate the tremendous significance and import of strategic bombing, Hap Arnold smashed Nazi plants and production lines, paralyzed their transportation, blasted their reserves and made possible the landings on the Normandy beachheads, the terrific and heroic drive of our Ground Forces across France, through the Siegfried line, over the Rhine, and on to the complete disaster of the German armies.

Few of us will ever know the difficulties encountered in keeping the European bombing offensive coordinated under the command of airmen so as to utilize maximum efficiency of air power. General Arnold well remembered those difficulties when he set up the great B-29 offensive in the Pacific. To insure that its mighty strategic strength would not be weakened by the divided command in the Pacific, he set up the headquarters of this great force here in Washington with himself directly in command. Here he was the commanding general of the Army Air Forces, a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, a member of the Combined Chiefs of Staff, and, in addition, brilliantly commanding the largest combat air force of all the world 5,000 miles from its theater of operations. What a general!

There is nothing in recorded history like it.

In early 1944, Hap Arnold took a trip to Europe. On the basis of what he saw there he decided in his own mind that the war in Europe would soon be finished. He forthwith cabled his staff in Washington to stop the enormous flow to Europe of aircraft, crews, bombs, ammunition, fuel, and all that goes with aerial war, and to channel the full weight of our air-power potential toward Japan. What a momentous decision! Only courage and military genius could make a decision of such import.

With that decision and all it meant in the bombing and burning and blasting of Japan, within 90 days from VE-day, without a single American ground soldier having to put his foot on the Japanese mainland, Japan surrendered and we celebrated VJ-day.

How sweet must be the thought tonight to Hap Arnold that his courage, his daring, his vision, and his genius contributed so much to the saving of the lives of thousands of American youth and of millions of American casualties.

It was a fateful quirk of chance that made Hap Arnold a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. But once he sat with the President and other service chiefs there was no question about the need for him in that body. At long last the Chief of the Air Force was in his rightful place. At long last air power had won recognition as an equal partner in waging the war. At long last the Army Air Forces had an authoritative voice in the decisions as to how and where they would be employed. Military aviation made its greatest forward step and Billy Mitchell stood vindicated.

Under Hap Arnold so brilliant were the achievements of the Army Air Forces, so magnificent their record, and so superior their contribution to the winning of the war that they cannot today be denied equal status and equal autonomy with land and sea forces. I tell you tonight that it shall be so written into the law of the land. Air power takes its place as America's first line of defense.

In this atomic age we know that our best hope for peace lies in an organized world under law and justice. We also know that until the world can be so organized—and the processes are slow, painfully slow—we must keep America strong if we would play our part in the leadership of the world and in the building of its peace. Men and nations do not follow weak leaders. And we must keep America strong that we may keep America free.

Hap Arnold, ever looking to the future, has already called in the scientists, the experts and the best brains of our country and started them on mountainous research to find the answers, to look 20 years into the future that we may best plan and shape our defenses. In his historic document, the Third Report of the Commanding General of the Army Air Forces to the Secretary of War, he has left a rare testament of wisdom and of experience for our guidance.

As we pay tribute tonight to Hap Arnold, we cannot forget her who has been his best lieutenant, his kindest critic, his wisest counselor and who has done so much to keep the home fires burning, Mrs. Hap Arnold.

Brooking no fear, quick to decide, going through with his purposes whatever obstacles opposed, Hap Arnold leaves an inspiring example of achievement, of devotion, of brilliant leadership, that will quicken and strengthen the spirit of the Army Air Forces down the years.

As Hap Arnold departs from us he carries with him our affection for him as a comrade, our appreciation of all that he has done for the Army Air Forces and our pride in his exalted services to our country and its free institutions. A searching survey of his record shows that there is no great act of his which our country would annul, no great decision by him which military judgment would reverse. His fame as a soldier is eternally fixed. He has won his place in the high fellowship of our country's great military leaders headed by George Washington. And we may know that if Washington were with us tonight he would join with us in saying to Hap Arnold, "Well done. Well done."

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, the hour is late, and I do not wish to take much time, but I do desire to join with the distinguished Senator from Alabama in his tribute to Gen. Henry H. Arnold.

Mr. President, the Arnold family is one of the most distinguished from the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. "Hap" Arnold, as we knew him as a young man, was reared in the same county in Pennsylvania where there resided several other distinguished generals, including General Hancock, General Hartranft, and General Stewart. It is a family which has been an inspiring one. The father was an outstanding soldier. The sister was an outstanding teacher and the dispenser of good will and humanitarian spirit all over the world.

Pennsylvania most reluctantly lost General Arnold to the great State of California, but he went to California for his health. He really was a casualty, a front-line casualty, of great World War II.

I wish to thank the Senator from Alabama for the fine tribute he has paid to a great Pennsylvanian.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE SENATOR HENRY J. ALLEN

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I rise to announce the death of Henry J. Allen, a distinguished Kansan, former United States Senator from the State of Kansas.

Henry Allen had a brilliant career as Governor of our State, and served with distinction the State and the Nation in the United States Senate. The high regard and esteem he commanded from the people of his native State is symbolized by the fact that he was elected Governor of Kansas while absent from the State, serving overseas with the American Red Cross during World War I.

He was well known as a journalist and newspaper publisher, and served as a war correspondent in Cuba during the Spanish-American War.

Henry Allen was in constant demand as a public speaker. His statesmanship was recognized when he was called upon to serve as a Special Commissioner of the Near East Relief to Armenia, Turkey, Greece, and southern Russia in 1923.

He was a fine and devout Christian gentleman. The Nation has lost an outstanding statesman, Kansas has lost a great citizen, and I have lost a faithful and understanding friend.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. HILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FULBRIGHT in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable report of a nomination was submitted:

By Mr. O'MAHONEY, from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs:

Oscar L. Chapman, of Colorado, to be Secretary of the Interior, to which office he was appointed during the last recess of the Senate.

NOMINATION OF OSCAR L. CHAPMAN TO BE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement with respect to Oscar L. Chapman, of Colorado, whose nomination to be Secretary of the Interior was favorably reported from committee today.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, in view of the fact that I will necessarily be absent from the session of the Senate tomorrow, Wednesday, January 18, 1950, on public business, and feeling that the confirmation of the Honorable Oscar L. Chapman for Secretary of the Interior will be before the Senate, I wish at this time to call attention to some of his outstanding qualifications for the position he is being called upon to fill.

Secretary Chapman is truly a great American. Born, reared, and educated in Virginia, he served with distinction in the armed forces of his country in World War I. Upon his return to civilian life he moved to the State of Colorado and became a part of the civic, social, and political life of that great State.

For many years he has occupied a position of real responsibility in the Department of the Interior. He also filled many important positions in the civilian activities of our country in World War II. He has, therefore, had the background of being a military soldier for his country in World War I, and a civilian soldier for his country in World War II.

He had demonstrated broad vision in the development of a mighty Nation. He has worked to inspire and improve the human resources of our country, and with equal zeal to conserve and build its natural resources.

In the positions which he has occupied he has evidenced constant courtesy and consideration both for those in his organizations and those who had business with him. He also has been efficient and tireless in meeting the responsibilities of the many positions which he has held.

Mr. President, truly he has been faithful over those things for which he has been given responsibility and thus has demonstrated that it is wise, proper, and fitting that he be given responsibility in larger and broader fields.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. C. R. Hooton, Methodist Board of Temperance, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, creator of all mankind, in whose gentle affection are the hearts of Thy creatures, look with compassion upon the plight of Thy children. By the might of Thy Holy Spirit quench the pride, the passions, and the greediness of men who divide and agitate people against people.

Help us by Thy word marvelously to work out the reconciliation of mankind. Give us faith to so follow Thee in higher loyalty that we may be united to each other in holy love. "Drop Thy still dews of quietness 'til all our strivings cease. Take from our souls the strain and stress, and let our ordered lives confess, the beauty of Thy peace."

In the Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Hawks, one of his secretaries.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in four instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. WOODRUFF asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and to include newspaper articles.

TAX REDUCTION AND VETERANS' BENEFITS

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill providing for a reduction in taxes. It is one of the few bills I have introduced in the 9 years I have been in Congress, because, like some great statesman once said, those who are governed least are governed best. Most of the good things we are offering to our people demand large outlays of tax money. Mr. Speaker, I have a consistent record of voting for reductions in expenditures ever since I have been in Congress. I feel I can be entirely consistent in also demanding a reduction in taxes. Leave the money in the pockets of those who are producing the wealth of this country and we will not need to worry about its economy. My bill also provides for payment of benefits to veterans in lieu of what will sometime come up in the way of a bonus. My bill also provides for special tax exemptions for veterans, the amount depending upon the tenure of service.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

HOLLOW DRILL STEEL

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include a letter from the Pittsburgh Crucible Steel Co.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, it is about time the American people awaken to what is happening to the industrial and economic life of the Nation.

The Crucible Steel Co. at its Park works in the city of Pittsburgh produces hollow drill steel for use in mines, quarries, and general contracting work. Ninety-five percent of the hollow drill steel consumed in this country during and since World War II has been produced in the State of Pennsylvania. However, it would now appear there is a possibility that such plants, employing hundreds of people, will have tougher competition sometime in the near future due to the State Department and the reciprocal trade treaties arrived at in the international conference at Annecy, France.

The average price on drill steel in the United States is 15 cents a pound, but due to the agreements entered into—and which were entered into before the devaluation of foreign currency—will permit the Canadians to offer to reduce the price to 12.17 cents per pound. The going price for Canadian consumption is 13½ cents per pound. The basic steel labor rate in Canada, in United States dollars, is approximately 93½ cents per hour. Contrast this with our current base rate in the United States of $1.65 per hour, which cost, I understand, will be increased by the pension and insurance agreements recently entered into. In addition, low-priced Swedish competition will certainly affect the American market because in that country the current labor rate based upon the devalued krona is approximately 37 cents per hour.

I understand it is expected that Canada will operate in the black in the current fiscal year and it is estimated will have a surplus of about $90,000,000. Canada is to be congratulated; this is an excellent recovery and a fine showing. If Canada can do it, we certainly should be able to balance our budget, reduce our expenditures, and get down to a sound, businesslike basis.

However, even in face of our unbalanced budget, the reciprocal trade treaties entered into will knock out American industry, dry up our source of revenue, and throw thousands of our people out of employment. It is about time the American people realize and awaken to what is happening in American industry and to the economy of the Nation.

CRUCIBLE STEEL CO. OF AMERICA,
Pittsburgh, Pa., December 13, 1949.

The Honorable LEON H. GAVIN,
Representative in Congress,
Oil City, Pa.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Knowing of your interest in the necessity for maximum employment of labor in the State of Pennsylvania, we take this opportunity of placing before you the following facts:

At our Park works in the city of Pittsburgh, we produce hollow drill steel for use in mines, quarries, and general contracting work. We believe we are perfectly safe in saying that at least 95 percent of the hollow drill steel consumed in this country during and since World War II has been produced in the State of Pennsylvania.

This specialty requires approximately 50 man-hours per ton in contrast with approximately 18 man-hours per ton for ordinary hot rolled steel. At the present moment our average price is approximately 15 cents a pound. We are now confronted with offerings from Canada at a base price of 10.045 cents per pound, United States dollars, plus duty or a total of 13.92 cents United States funds. Effective as of January 1, 1950, the Canadians offer to reduce that price to 12.17 cents per pound because of a reduction in duty January 1, arrived at in the international conference at Annecy, France, of from 3.875 cents to 2.125 cents. Their going price for Canadian consumption is 13½ cents per pound.

The changes in import duties into the United States were negotiated during April through August 1949. We assume that during that time no consideration was given to the possible devaluation of foreign exchange which eventually took place on September 22, 1949. As a result we are now subject to a double-barreled attack. The various trade treaties, we believe, contain escape clauses which can be used to at least dampen the powder in one barrel.

The basic steel labor rate on that commodity in Canada as of this date is $1.04 an hour or in United States dollars approximately 93½ cents in contrast with our current base rate of $1.65 per hour which cost will be materially increased by the pension and insurance agreements just concluded with the CIO.

A conservative estimate indicates a monthly production of 1,000 tons which means at least 50,000 man-hours or $82,500 per month but actually nearer $90,000. This, in turn, could easily be translated into at least 600,000 man-hours per year or a million-dollar pay roll covering at least 300 employees.

That is the situation that confronts us at the moment; in addition to which, plans are now being laid for a further international conference in September 1950, at which time we are led to believe that consideration will be given to further reductions in certain import duties.

There is another important factor in connection with this type of production, and that is consideration of what could happen in case of a national emergency. This item is unusually important in all types of mining, and during the last war mines and construction work were entirely dependent upon domestic production for their requirements.

We realize that special steels of this type represent but a small segment of the total steel volume, but there are many other special steel items under attack, all of which represent a tremendous number of man-hours; some items even as high as 200 man-hours per ton.

In addition to the Canadian, we already see definite indications of low-priced Swedish competition in special steels. In that country the current labor rate based upon the devalued krona is approximately 37 cents an hour. In your opinion, how can industry pay our going rates and cope with that type of competition?

Are we correct in assuming that this is a matter of interest to you and what action will you take to prevent the contemplated reduction in import duties as of January 1 and a further revision next September?

Respectfully yours,

R. E. CHRISTIE,
Executive Vice President.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McGREGOR asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a news release.

SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order granted me for today may be put over until tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

COAL SHORTAGE EMERGENCY

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, the President states, in a news conference that he is watching the weather to make up his mind if he will enforce laws passed by Congress to secure a resumption of coal production in this country. Watching the weather and permitting the coal strike to continue, affords no relief or comfort to American families in the Central and Northwestern States who are suffering from want of coal. Official weather reports from these sections show temperatures from 10 to 25 degrees below zero.

The failure of the President to act in accordance with the law, in the present coal-shortage emergency, will cause widespread suffering and hardship for thousands of families whose coal bins are empty. Mr. President, the emergency is here and you should act at once.

My survey in southern Minnesota, where temperatures are as low as 10 degrees below zero, shows that scores of communities will be without coal by the end of this week. Dealers' bins are empty and immediate action must be taken to provide the people with necessary fuel.

Mr. Speaker, in the event that the President of the United States does not take action to secure a resumption in coal production by Friday of this week, I call upon you to convene an extraordinary session of the House of Representatives for the purpose of taking emergency action in the present coal-shortage crisis.

Mr. Speaker, a critical emergency exists in coal supplies. Shut-down of many school systems is reported imminent. Hospitals and other institutions face alarming shortages in many places. Rail transportation is greatly curtailed, and a state of emergency has been proclaimed in some areas. Again I demand, Mr. Speaker, that the House convene to take appropriate action if the President fails to carry out existing law.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SADLAK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

LEWIS AND THE COAL SITUATION

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Speaker, from personal observation and comments of parties who are conversant with the subject matter, I learned something of the present danger of the John L. Lewis coal strike and the repercussions that are bound to follow.

In the Chicago area 73 passenger trains have been put out of commission, all to the detriment and discomfort of our citizens. Dim-outs were ordered to take effect in 28 State institutions. Stock piles of coal have dwindled to almost nothing because of the lack of coal shipments. People on relief cannot get coal for their stoves because there is none of the proper size to supply them.

People are asking why the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law are not invoked to obtain the relief called for under that law.

The question is this: Is it right to play cheap provincial politics with the miseries and hardships now being perpetrated upon the people of our Nation?

The answer to that question is obvious: Playing politics with a national crisis surely is not the decent thing to do—but some statesmen regard it as being highly propitious.

Suffering and hardships untold are in the immediate offing due to the lack of coal, and the responsibility, actual and potential, should be placed squarely where it belongs—and there is only one place where it does belong—and that is on the shoulders of Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, who refuses to live up to his oath of office and enforce the laws of the Nation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

THE COAL SITUATION

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, people are getting cold north of Mason and Dixon's line. When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JONAS] begins to complain, he lines up with the senior Democratic Senator from that State, who gave the President like information a few days ago.

When we find our good friend, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN]—I think he is a Norwegian—saying it is cold; when a Norwegian says it is cold why it is cold—freezing to the rest of us—and there is no question about it.

The civil-rights folks are here. Because they are or were here, I saw 12 extra policemen on duty in front of our office building this morning when I came to work. To those advocates of the President's civil-rights program I say that if you gentlemen will just fix it up so that citizens can exercise their right to buy a little coal and keep warm and cook we would appreciate it and perhaps be in favor of a civil-rights program. And if you are honest and sincere, and of course you are, in your talk about discrimination because of race, creed, or color, you will fix up the proposed legislation so the people can exercise the right to work, the right to go out and buy something to eat, the right to buy a little coal to keep warm. If the President and Lewis permit that it will be helpful to some of our folks who are snowed and frozen in. We cannot all go to Florida when Mr. Truman and Mr. Lewis go there.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

FOREIGN COMPETITION

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I want you all to be nifty, and thrifty, in fifty. Somebody just put a badge on my shoulder and said "You belong to the TTP," and I asked what that was. "Tired Tax Payer," they told me. They are putting everything on me nowadays and are forcing me to do a lot of things I do not like.

I wish at this time to comment on a statement made by my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GAVIN], just a minute ago when he talked about the effect of the reciprocal trade agreements on steel. The same steel industry in which he is interested I am likewise interested in from the standpoint of helping them. They asked me what could be done to change the tariff to protect the industry and what I could do with the President to get him to change his reciprocal trade treaty program. I said "Nothing; I have no influence with the President of the United States. But I will tell you what to do. Your plant is going to be closed if you do not get your people, your labor leaders in and tell them they will be out of jobs if they do not come down to see President Truman and tell him what his policies are doing to them." I think that is the only answer.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PHILLIPS of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. McDONOUGH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two separate instances and in each include extraneous matter.

Mr. D'EWART asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. RIEHLMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article from the Washington Evening Star.

Mr. ANGELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an article from the Woman's Home Companion.

ANENT TODAY'S POLITICAL HUBBUB

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, for several days now I have sat in the House of Representatives in patriotic horror while all of us here have been stormed with ultrareactionary sentiments and, before I express myself, I want to extend due apologies to a very worthy author for messing up his splendid verse, so that I might in rhyme say that today we have heard—

Bits of ancient, puzzling observation
From old G. Gabrielson wild-garnered each
As pebbles worn and polished slick,
In the current of right-wing-ed speech!

The average normal person ofttimes, to give vent to his pent feelings, throws his hat up into the air, whereas the present-day boisterously blundering political reactionary, for a like purpose, discloses his abnormality by everlastingly throwing the air up into his hat, or where his hat ought to be.

The modern-day political reactionary has discarded the Golden Rule of the ages followed by the average normal person and again to show his abnormality has substituted therefor the reactionary rule of gold.

Today ignoble political reactionaries make abnormal uproar for the blood and the political crucifixion of our truly great and realistic friend of the people, President Harry S. Truman, in much the same deicide fashion as the sadistic old high priests of eld cried out for the blood and the crucifixion of the God-proffered Saviour of mankind.

My, how thoroughly antisocial, cruel, and cunning old Joe Stalin must just simply love these unwittingly, un-American efforts in his behalf.

Political reactionaries today may advertise haughtily their venal verdure, personally and through equally venal media, and spread themselves like the Biblical green bay tree—Laurus nobilis—and claim that the power of gold is supreme but what doth it avail them—it, too, shall pass away like a drunkard's disturbing dream and be lost forever in fathomless nothingness long before their life's bad book shall have found its last resting place in oblivion's uncataloged library.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McCORMACK (at the request of Mr. PRIEST) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article from the Boston Globe.

Mr. DOLLINGER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. TAURIELLO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter and a resolution of the New York State liquor authority.

Mr. JUDD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include extraneous material.

Mr. SHAFER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances.

MEMBERS INVITED TO VISIT NATIONAL GALLERY OF ART

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the Members, I desire to read a letter which is addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

NATIONAL GALLERY OF ART,
Washington, D. C., January 12, 1950.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: The exhibition of works of art from the Vienna museums, which are on loan from the Austrian Government to the National Gallery, will close on Sunday, January 22. The attendance has been very large and will probably increase during the closing days of the exhibition.

I would like for the Members of the House of Representatives and their families to have an opportunity of seeing the collection as comfortably as possible and would be delighted to arrange a private view for them on Friday afternoon, January 20, after the Gallery closes at 5 p. m. We should be glad to have them come to the Gallery from 5:15 to 7 p. m. and to use the entrance on Constitution Avenue at Sixth Street. I should be grateful if you would be kind enough to extend the invitation to them and also to the Representative's secretaries, clerks of the committees, and members of the House press gallery, with their wives.

I hope that we shall have the pleasure of welcoming you on that occasion, and with kind regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,
DAVID E. FINLEY,
Director.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, on tomorrow, after disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk and at the conclusion of any special orders heretofore entered into, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes; and in the event that the House is not in session on tomorrow, I ask that I may have this special order on the first day after that in which the House is in session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Armed Services and to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

In compliance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1915, as amended, establishing the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, I transmit herewith the thirty-fifth annual report of the committee covering the fiscal year 1949.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 16, 1950.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CANFIELD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

ATOMIC DEFENSE OF AMERICAN CITIES

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I shall always remember my visit to Corregidor in January 1946, 4½ months after Hiroshima and Nagasaki. I had always been under the impression that Corregidor was America's fortress of the seas, an impregnable rock. How chagrined and how disillusioned I was to see that on Corregidor the most modern guns that we had in World War II were of the vintage of 1898 and 1900. There were no modern antiaircraft guns, in fact no modern guns of any kind, on Corregidor.

When I spoke to those in charge of our tour that day about this situation, it was explained to me that our country had adhered religiously to the Disarmament Pact while Japan was fortifying Truk and other islands of the Pacific. "No," they said, "we did not even dare sneak in anything of a modern nature."

Mr. Speaker, last summer I was equally chagrined, I was equally disillusioned, when I learned for the first time that our country had no real federally coordinated plans for the atomic defense of our cities. That is how this information came about.

I received a letter from Vincent Duffy, cochairman of civilian defense in my home city of Paterson, N. J., which, incidentally, is labeled as a prime target in the case of an atomic-bomb attack, and he asked me for information from the Federal Government that would be helpful to him and his organization. I sent the request downtown and I was advised that there was no information at that time of a Federal nature, and that Mr. Duffy should send his inquiry to the State authorities at Trenton, N. J. Whereupon, I wrote the President of the United States asking the question "Wherefore," and the answer came back from Dr. John R. Steelman, now Acting Chairman of the National Security Resources Board. He told me that the whole problem under date of October 5 last had been turned over to the various States, with the Federal Government acting only in an advisory and counseling capacity.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have come to five conclusions after studying this problem, and they are these:

First. There is no coordinated Federal plan for civilian defense of American cities against atom bomb or poison-gas attack.

Second. All of the States are not cooperating in the effort begun by Mr. Steelman, although my own State of New Jersey is. I talked about this problem to one of my colleagues the other day. He comes from a large industrial State. He told me this: "I went to my Governor just a week or so ago and asked him if he had received a letter from Dr. Steelman on civilian defense, and his answer was, 'Yes, I received such a letter, but in all frankness, I have misplaced it.' "

Third. There is some question as to whether civilian defense of American cities should be under the Federal Security Resources Board and not under our Defense Establishment.

Fourth. Dr. John R. Steelman is too busy to be the Chairman of the National Security Resources Board. Dr. John R. Steelman is the President's alter ego, his trouble-shooter. He has a hundred and one tasks assigned to him. Ofttimes he has to leave Washington to meet problems of labor and management. He is too busy for this most important undertaking. The administration has been remiss in not making a permanent Chairman of the National Security Resources Board charged with this undertaking, a chairman who knows something about the problem and can give it time, study, and effort.

Fifth. The Congress of the United States cannot longer delay a proper review of the problem. As I have said, New Jersey is going ahead under Governor Driscoll's on-his-toes leadership.

I have recently received and I am going to read a very informative and very challenging letter from Leonard Dreyfuss, civilian defense director from my State of New Jersey. He says, among other things:

My basic philosophy on civilian defense is this: Our national war machine—Army, Navy, and Air Force—costs the United States some $15,000,000,000 a year; more than one-third of every citizen's tax payment. If that colossal war machine is necessary, then certainly civil defense is vitally important, otherwise the war expenditure must be a sheer extravagant waste.

Certainly, our State Department and armed forces are concerned with the possibility of war. If the unbelievable happens and we have a third war, it will strike fast and there will be no time for preparation or training. The States on the eastern and western seaboards are particularly vulnerable. We, in New Jersey, feel that we are a critically vulnerable area. We are an industrial State. We are important, too, because we have the longest coastline on the Atlantic Ocean. we feel it would be sheer neglect not to prepare our citizens for any eventuality. Therefore, we are organizing our civil defense without any waving of flags or blowing of bugles, but on a thoroughly practical basis.

I am going to put the New Jersey plan in the RECORD.

When I first became concerned about this problem last summer I was attracted to a byline story in the Washington newspapers saying what? Saying this: A reporter had gone downtown and visited the three Commissioners who under law are charged with carrying out the administration of District of Columbia affairs, and not one Commissioner could tell him anything about civilian defense for our Nation's Capital. The Superintendent of Police, Major Barrett, said to this reporter, "I tried to get some information from Federal authorities but I could not get anything." Now, I have something. I have in a small envelope in my office all the material that the Federal Government, the National Security Resources Board, through its Acting Chairman, John R. Steelman, has been able to get together on this subject. I am terribly concerned about our national approach to this problem.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from California, who, like myself, comes from a very important industrial seaboard State.

Mr. McDONOUGH. I congratulate the gentleman on bringing this matter to the attention of the House. It is a very vital question. I wonder if the gentleman is familiar with my House Joint Resolution 369? I introduced it previous to the recess. If passed, it would have authorized the Secretary of Defense to hold public hearings in all the important centers throughout the United States in order to formulate a civilian defense program against an atomic-bomb attack.

Mr. CANFIELD. I know about that and I commend my colleague.

Mr. McDONOUGH. In addition, there is as a matter of record the Hopley report, which outlines a method of civilian defense.

Mr. CANFIELD. I know about that, too, may I say to the gentleman from California.

Mr. McDONOUGH. However, no action has been taken on any of these.

Mr. CANFIELD. That is true. I know the gentleman is concerned. I know about his approach to the matter. It is time for those hearings to begin.

May I say also that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] has given much serious thought to this problem, and he, too, is terribly concerned.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman's talk is very instructive. May I add that it is very timely, in view of the fact that the State Department and the present administration have this country entangled in every quarrel everywhere in the world today. It is about time, instead of mixing into every fight, that we get ready for those we ask for.

Mr. CANFIELD. I will agree with the gentleman that it is very timely, in view of the atomic explosions that have taken place in Russia.

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HUBER. The gentleman speaks of his first-hand knowledge of this by being there. Is that right?

Mr. CANFIELD. That is right.

Mr. HUBER. That is one reason why more Members of Congress should make inspection trips, notwithstanding the criticism. How else will they know, when otherwise they would have to depend on somebody to come back here from 10,000 miles away and tell them about the situation?

Mr. CANFIELD. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include with my remarks today the correspondence I have had with the President of the United States and a letter from the Civil Defense Director of New Jersey, Mr. Leonard Dreyfuss, outlining how my State is proceeding to protect its citizenry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., September 30, 1949.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am concerned about a newspaper story published this week in Washington stating no national program has been developed for civilian defense in American cities in the event of an atomic or poison-gas attack. Washington city officials are quoted they have been given no advice, and the cities of Chicago and Detroit are said to be appraising their local situations.

My district is in a so-called target area, possibly the No. 1. The civilian defense heads in Paterson are currently seeking information and they have been unable to get such from Washington other than a reference to State authorities.

I am certain you will agree neglect, especially in the light of your recent announcement, would be unconscionable and I am equally certain you will insist on Federal authorities educating and assisting our citizenry as to the potentials of atomic warfare and methods to meet any attack in our cities and towns.

As a member of the House Subcommittee on Appropriations handling stock-piling funds, I have been glad to note your statement urging the Congress to delete the Senate rider rescinding $275,000,000 in stock-piling funds already appropriated. On August 5 last I warned the House any such cut-back would be tampering with our national security. I repeated this last Wednesday and I shall follow through.

With assurances of esteem, believe me,

Very sincerely,

GORDON CANFIELD,
Member of Congress.

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
NATIONAL SECURITY RESOURCES BOARD,
Washington, October 17, 1949.

Hon. GORDON CANFIELD,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CANFIELD: The President has asked me to acknowledge your letter of September 30, 1949, and to indicate his appreciation of your interest in and deep concern for the civil defense and stock-piling aspects of our preparedness program.

Six months ago, the President asked the National Security Resources Board to take over the leadership in civil defense planning. After considerable study of the work then in process, the NSRB made assignments of planning responsibility to several departments and agencies. These assignments are explained in some detail in an announcement made to the press on June 26, 1949. A copy of that announcement is attached for your convenience.

Very recently, we were asked by the International Association of Police Chiefs and the International Association of Fire Chiefs to give them an accounting of the current status of civil defense planning in the Federal Government. I believe it would be of interest to you to review the address made to the fire chiefs by our Coordinator of Civil Defense Planning on September 28, 1949, copy attached. A similar address was made to the police chiefs.

On October 5, 1949, after appropriate consideration by its members, the Board sent to the governors of all the States and Territories a 10-point statement of policies with respect to civil defense planning. A copy of this statement and of the covering letter are attached as NSRB Document 121.

Our concern with another aspect of protection against attack is reflected in the publication by the NSRB of the booklet entitled, "The National Security Factors in Industrial Locations."

I trust that the above information and the attachments will serve to indicate to you that the newspaper story which prompted your letter apparently was not based upon authentic information. While it is true that the Federal Government is not in a position to furnish all the information needed by State and local governments from Federal sources to develop their own civil defense plans, it should be evident that we are progressing toward that objective.

Your reference to your actions with respect to the stock-piling appropriation has been noted by the President and he is most appreciative of your support.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN R. STEELMAN.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE,
Trenton, N. J., December 28, 1949.

The Honorable GORDON CANFIELD,
Paterson, N. J.

DEAR GORDON: I am gratified that you and your colleagues are concerned with the matter of civil defense and are going to give it thorough consideration.

As you know, during World War II I was civil defense director for the State of New Jersey and also chairman of the East Coast Conference of Civil Defense Directors, comprising all States from Maine to Florida on the eastern seaboard. I served as a volunteer without pay. Governor Driscoll, early this year, reappointed me civil defense director, and we in New Jersey have given the matter very careful study.

My basic philosophy on civil defense is this: Our national war machine—Army, Navy, and Air Force—costs the United States some $15,000,000,000 a year; more than one-third of every citizen's tax payment. If that colossal war machine is necessary, then certainly civil defense is vitally important. Otherwise, the war expenditure must be a sheer extravagant waste.

Certainly, our State Department and armed forces are concerned with the possibility of war. If the unbelievable happens and we have a third war, it will strike fast, and there will be no time for preparation or training. The States on the eastern and western seaboards are particularly vulnerable. We, in New Jersey, feel that we are a critically vulnerable area. We are an industrial State. We are important, too, because we have the longest coast line on the Atlantic Ocean. We feel it would be sheer neglect not to prepare our citizens for any eventuality. Therefore, we are organizing our civil defense without any waving of flags or blowing of bugles, but on a thoroughly practical basis. We urge that your legislative body give thought to and investigate our plan. Boiled down, it is this:

We have asked each mayor in the State to appoint a civil-defense chairman and as many subcommittees as he deems necessary, according to the size of the municipality. This gives us, roughly some 3,000 citizens who will, in effect, be the executive staff of civil defense for the State. These people are going to be thoroughly trained in what to expect and how to act in the event of either a wartime or peacetime catastrophe. Then, should there be a war, there would be no difficulty in recruiting manpower under them, but at least 3,000 people throughout the State will know what to do and can go into immediate action. This is the plan we want to put before your committee.

Civil defense at the Federal level has been taken out of the jurisdiction of the Secretary of Defense and is now based under the National Security Resources Board, of which Dr. John R. Steelman is president.

It is my considered opinion that this is a grave mistake. I say this because of a very important reason. It is not easy to recruit civilians without pay in peacetime unless they are assured that what they are asked to do has important military significance. Regardless of the importance of the National Security Resources Board, it sounds like just another Government bureau to the average civilian and he does not feel that he wants to work without pay for a civilian bureau of the Government. This may seem trivial at the first reading, but it is of vital importance if we are to recruit an army of civilian volunteers and keep them interested in their task.

Governor Driscoll feels very strongly that the auxiliary police and firemen, who did such fine work during the war, have tremendous peacetime value for all of our municipalities. The communities that kept their auxiliary police and firemen when the war ended will all tell you that they would not do without them. They have been of tremendous help in emergencies such as bad fires or even local football games where additional police are needed.

In New Jersey, when World War II broke, we had some 250 professional forest-fire fighters. These men were young and able-bodied citizens who immediately went to war. We then recruited some 6,000 citizens and trained them in the art of fire fighting. We have never disbanded this force and they are of tremendous influence today in the conservation of our wooded areas. These are just a few of the peacetime dividends that the State of New Jersey got out of its wartime civil defense.

Civil defense in New Jersey is now a division of the Department of Defense which is so ably headed by Maj. Gen. Edward A. Rose. General Rose agrees with me that civil defense should be kept a civilian activity because in the event of war, the State Guard would be immediately recruited into the National Army and therefore of no avail for home defense.

This past year, at the Governor's suggestion, a civil defense bill was introduced, giving the Governor the right to declare a state of emergency when a catastrophe hits New Jersey. At that time, the civil-defense forces go into action when the Governor so directs. In other words, Governor Driscoll, today, has all of the wartime powers of civil defense which he can utilize in peacetime when a serious situation arises.

I earnestly recommend that other States follow this example. I believe that 10 or 11 have already done so. New York State has drawn a similar legislative act to be presented when their State assembly reconvenes in January. The one thing that is lacking in the picture is strong and definite direction from Washington. I think an active and well-trained civil defense organization on the eastern and western seaboards would be of tremendous military importance and would provide one more reason why hostile nations would hesitate to attack us.

To sum up, as I said in the foregoing paragraphs, I believe civil defense at the Federal level should provide strong leadership to the States. Should be based under the Secretary of Defense—not as at present—with some of the duties under the National Securities Resources Board, some under the old Public Works Administration, some under the Health Service, etc. It will work best, in my judgment, under the Secretary of Defense, with other services being called upon for advice but for no specific direction.

Sincerely,

LEONARD DREYFUSS,
State Director of Civil Defense.

AMENDMENT OF PARAGRAPH (2) (C) OF RULE XI OF THE RULES OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 133, Rept. No. 1477), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That paragraph (2) (c) of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(c) The Committee on Rules shall present to the House reports concerning rules, joint rules, and order of business, within three legislative days of the time when ordered reported by the committee. If such rule or order is not considered immediately, it shall be referred to the calendar and, if not called up by the Member making the report within seven legislative days thereafter, any member of the Rules Committee may call it up as a question of privilege and the Speaker shall recognize any member of the Rules Committee seeking recognition for that purpose. If the Committee on Rules shall make an adverse report on any resolution pending before the committee, providing for an order of business for the consideration by the House of any public bill or joint resolution, on days when it shall be in order to call up motions to discharge committees it shall be in order for any Member of the House to call up for consideration by the House any such adverse report, and it shall be in order to move the adoption by the House of said resolution adversely reported notwithstanding the adverse report of the Committee on Rules, and the Speaker shall recognize the Member seeking recognition for that purpose as a question of the highest privilege."

AMENDING RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution concerning which instructions were given by the Rules Committee this morning to the effect that I should file it. I am stepping aside with the understanding that the chairman file it and that he will ask the Speaker to recognize him on Thursday to call it up, and in the event he the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is not present that I may call it up or some member of the committee favorable to the resolution shall call it up. Is that correct, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. SABATH. To be candid, I did not hear the statement. I did not hear the gentleman's statement.

Mr. COX. I said that the understanding between the chairman and the committee is that I am stepping aside as the member designated to file the report, leaving it to the chairman to file it and he files it with the understanding that he will ask the Speaker to recognize him on Thursday to call it up; and in the event the chairman is not present, the understanding is that I shall call it up or some other member of the committee favorable to the resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. On what Thursday are you going to call this up?

Mr. COX. The coming Thursday, the day after tomorrow.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I had understood that that could not come up this week and that it would not come up before next week, and I so advised many Members to that effect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Massachusetts will remember that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK] made the statement that the Korean-aid bill would be the only thing to come up this week, unless the Committee on Rules reported out a rule providing for the consideration of other matters.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. He also made the statement that the Korean bill would come up on Thursday.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. COLMER. Of course, the gentleman from Massachusetts understands that this is a matter which the Committee on Rules itself decided upon and which could not be anticipated under the circumstances.

RULE ON FEPC BILL

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules has considered the rule on the fair employment practices bill today. The committee ordered reported the resolution, House Resolution 133, introduced by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox], on Friday, January 13, which would eliminate the procedure under the rule which we adopted on the first day of this Congress giving the committees the right, when the Committee on Rules fails to act within 21 days, to file a resolution to discharge the Committee on Rules.

Today we were considering a rule for the FEPC bill, this being the third day of its deliberations on this measure. The rule on the Cox resolution was granted, over my protest, of course, last Friday. Under the rules of the House, the chairman of the Committee on Rules has 3 days within which to file a report on a rule. I intended to file the report within this time because I have never violated the rules of the House in my 44 years of service and 20 years as a member of the Committee on Rules.

But today some members of the Committee on Rules thought the report on the Cox resolution should be filed immediately and that the right to file should be taken away from the chairman, and that the rule should be called up by the gentleman who introduced it, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox]. I felt that that was a violation of the rules of the House, because the Rules of the House plainly state as follows:

It shall be the duty of the chairman of each such committee to report or cause to be reported promptly to the Senate or House of Representatives, as the case may be, any measure approved by such committee—

The word "promptly" means within the rules—within 3 days—which I did intend to do. I thought originally that the motion of the gentleman from Georgia was out of order and so ruled, but it being 12 o'clock we adjourned, but nevertheless some of the members remained and wanted to act upon it.

In order to avoid any controversy that might develop I agreed to file it today instead of tomorrow, and I am filing the report today on the resolution.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] approached me on the floor and wanted to know if I was not present Thursday, whether the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] could call up the resolution. I said if I were not here Thursday, I would have no objection to Mr. Cox calling it up.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. COX. I have no desire to air publicly what took place in the Rules Committee this morning. It is the understanding that the gentleman will file the rule today and will ask the Speaker to recognize him on Thursday to call it up, and, in the event he is not here, it is agreeable that some other member of the committee do so.

Mr. SABATH. That was an afterthought. I do not know. I know that the committee agreed and the House agreed to take up another bill in which I and the House are very much interested. I have filed my report. As to the other procedure, I do not know whether it would be in order for me to agree to call it up Thursday, because I do not know whether that will give time enough for Members to be here on this important question.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, that is not in accord with the agreement.

Mr. SABATH. I am not inclined to create any unnecessary controversy in the House. I am trying to bring about orderly procedure.

Mr. COX. Without intending to offend, Mr. Speaker, that is an evasion, and it is not in keeping with the understanding we had on the floor a few minutes ago. The understanding was that if I would step aside, having been designated by the committee to act, and let the chairman make the report, that he would ask the Speaker to recognize him to call it up on Thursday, and in the event he is not present, that I would call it up, or some other member of the committee.

Mr. SABATH. Well, I do not say that I will not call it up Thursday. I do not want to say that, but I do not want to be bound by that.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I will have to withdraw the statement I made, based upon the agreement and understanding I had with the chairman, and ask the Speaker to recognize me to file the report.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLMER. Of course, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rules, I am sure, wants to be perfectly fair and carry out all commitments. I am going to ask my distinguished chairman if he did not tell me a few minutes ago, standing in the well of this House, that it would be agreeable to him, and that he would not raise any question if he could not be here on Thursday and could not call it up, that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox], or some other member of the Rules Committee could call it up.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from Mississippi did come to me after I had stated that I was going to file the rule today. He did ask, if I am not in town, whether I would agree that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] should call up the resolution. I said, "If I am not in town, and Mr. Cox is recognized by the Speaker, I would have no objection to it."

Mr. COX. May I ask the gentleman a question? Did not the gentleman tell me that he would call it up Thursday?

Mr. SABATH. Well, I do not remember saying that I would call it up Thursday.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman know that I would never have agreed to step aside——

Mr. SABATH. Oh, stepping aside, nothing. I have a right to file it, and what you have tried to do in the committee does not matter. Under the rules of the House I have the right and privilege to file the resolution, and no one else.

Mr. COX. Is it the intention of the gentleman to call it up Thursday; and if he does not, then will it be agreeable for some other member of the committee to do so?

Mr. SABATH. I said if I am not in town and it is agreeable that the Speaker will recognize you and you want to call it up, it is all right with me.

Mr. COX. But if the gentleman is here, does he intend to ask the Speaker to recognize him to call it up?

Mr. SABATH. Well, I do not know. I want to consult with the Speaker and others.

Mr. DELANEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. DELANEY. On Friday last, the committee reported out this resolution by a vote of 9 to 2. Is that correct?

Mr. SABATH. Correct.

Mr. DELANEY. And in accordance with that action of the committee today the gentleman filed the report; is that right?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. DELANEY. And it is not necessary that the gentleman make any commitment to anyone other than to file it according to the direction of the committee; is that right?

Mr. SABATH. That is my opinion.

Mr. DELANEY. That is exactly what the gentleman ought to do.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman from Illinois state to the House whether or not, so far as he knows, he will be in town on Thursday?

Mr. SABATH. To be candid, I ought to be home because of the illness of Mrs. Sabath. I will know this afternoon or tonight how she is. I may be obliged to leave tomorrow if she is not in good health; if the doctors say she is not improving I will have to leave tomorrow or the day after. At the moment I do not know, but I will know later in the day.

As the gentleman realizes, I was not here the first few days of the session; I was not able to come when the House met on the 3d of the month because of her illness; I came only last Monday.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Under the circumstances I appreciate the answer of the gentleman from Illinois, but to resolve the question presently before us it would be pertinent to know whether or not the gentleman is to be in town, because apparently he has stated that his being agreeable to the rule's being called up by some other member of the Rules Committee depended on whether or not he was to be in town.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield to me, by direction of the Committee on Rules I file a privileged resolution; and permit me to make this statement; these differences may be ironed out later.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Georgia if it is the same resolution that has already been reported to the House.

Mr. COX. I presume it is the same resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubts very seriously whether two reports on the same resolution can be filed at the same time.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the filing of this rule at this time.

The SPEAKER. Permit the Chair to handle this matter.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. But I am making a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was clarifying the situation. The Chair is of opinion that two reports cannot be filed on the same resolution at the same time.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I addressed my remarks to the gentleman from Illinois. I will ask the gentleman: Is it the gentleman's intention in keeping with the agreement that he had with me in the event that he is here Thursday to ask the Speaker to recognize him?

Mr. SABATH. I will state this to you, sir——

Mr. COX. No, no; that is what you said to me, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, because you say so, I do not so understand. I did say this, that if I am not in the city that I have no objection to your calling up the resolution.

Mr. COX. But if the gentleman is here, did he not say he would ask——

Mr. SABATH. Is not that what I said?

Mr. COX. Did you not tell me twice that you would ask the Speaker to recognize you?

Mr. SABATH. I do not say that I will not call it up; I am going to consult with the Speaker and the majority leader.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has consumed at least a minute.

Mr. SABATH. I think I have.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this is a disagreeable situation to have arise here, and I would hope the Speaker would permit the Committee on Rules to file the resolution which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] was directed to file and let this matter simmer over the day. I think the gentlemen can get together in a friendly arrangement about it, and arrange for some time that will be agreeable to all parties to bring this measure up. If we could have this opportunity of having the two resolutions lying on the table just to be reported so that we could try and iron out this thing in a friendly, orderly sort of way instead of having a rather unbecoming discussion concerning it here all the morning, I think the difficulty could be solved. I am wondering if in the interest of harmony and getting this matter straightened out the Speaker would not permit the Committee on Rules to file the resolution which the gentleman from Georgia has attempted to file.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is trying to carry out orderly procedure. If two identical resolutions on the same subject matter can be reported, then a number can be reported and the RECORD would be cluttered up. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Virginia will not say that he hopes the Chair will allow something to be done if he thinks it is unnecessary because the report has already been filed.

As to the agreement, the Chair knows nothing about that, and the Chair thinks that any agreement that may be worked out between now and tomorrow can as well be worked out without the reporting of an unnecessary resolution as with it.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I hope the Speaker understands I am not finding fault with his ruling; as a matter of fact, I have no right to. I am speaking in a conciliatory way hoping that we may iron something out.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes this whole matter can be ironed out also.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. KEEFE asked and was given permission to address the House tomorrow for 30 minutes following disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk and at the conclusion of any special orders heretofore entered.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Members are fully informed as to the rule governing the calling up of resolutions reported by the Rules Committee. Am I correct in my understanding that the gentleman from the Rules Committee who files a rule is the only one permitted to call up the resolution for a period of seven legislative days?

The SPEAKER. That is true unless the committee directs otherwise.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, do not the rules of the House provide that the gentleman who files a resolution with the Speaker is the only one permitted to call up the resolution and does the Speaker mean that the Committee on Rules can by a majority vote override what is provided in the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. Of course, the chairman could request another member of the committee to call up a resolution in his absence. That certainly could be done. Otherwise, if the chairman of the Rules Committee were out of town continuously the Committee on Rules could not offer a resolution and, as a matter of fact, the House could not function either.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I beg the Chair's pardon?

The SPEAKER. If it were otherwise, and if the chairman of the committee were out of town the whole session, the Committee on Rules could not operate, neither could the House.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, my point is that the gentleman who files a petition has the privilege for seven legislative days to call up the resolution and failing to call it up within that time, after the 7 days any member of the Rules Committee can call it up; is that correct?

The SPEAKER. That is what the rule says but that is not what we have been talking about for the last half hour. The Chair trusts no more parliamentary inquiries will be addressed to the Chair for the simple reason that he would like to see these misunderstandings composed.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I think every Member of the House realizes the importance of the resolution which has just been discussed and about which I have directed a parliamentary inquiry. I think also that the Members of the House are beginning to realize that the whole country is aroused over this resolution and this very important proposal to go back to the rules as they existed before the commencement of the Eighty-first Congress.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it would be the wise thing for the House to wait for a few days before considering a major proposition like this. It is further my considered judgment that those who are trying to rush through this resolution are doing so because of the fear in their hearts that they will hear from the country at large, and that they are trying to put something over on the American people before they can find out what is going on in Washington. They are trying, in my opinion, to put over a fast one involving a matter that will affect legislation for many, many years to come. Mr. Speaker, this should not be rushed through when many Members are away from Washington.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. MURDOCK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a letter.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

AMENDMENT OF RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I would like to restate for the understanding of everyone that when I stepped aside and yielded to the chairman the right to report the resolution reported in the Committee on Rules this morning, I stated the conditions under which I was doing so. The agreement or understanding had with the chairman was to the effect that if I would step aside the chairman would file the report today, and he would ask the Speaker to recognize him on Thursday to call it up, and in the event he was not here that I would have that privilege.

AMENDING RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I think it is obvious to the whole country what this maneuvering that has been going on in and out of the Rules Committee is all about. The purpose of this maneuver is to bypass what ordinarily would take place next Monday, and that is the calling up of the FEPC bill if the Speaker recognizes the chairman of the Committee on Labor, and if the chairman of the Committee on Labor asks for recognition.

I do not believe, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], that if a private agreement was made between the two, that that agreement is binding on the House or on the country. The interests of FEPC and civil rights are paramount to any private agreement that may have been entered into between the two gentlemen, if such an agreement was entered into. Any private agreement operating against civil-rights legislation is contrary to the public interest and can have no validity.

The rules of the House give the chairman of the Rules Committee seven legislative days in which to call up the resolution that is intended to deprive the House of the right to vote on FEPC next Monday. He is honor bound not to call it up until after next Monday. He is one of the leaders of the Democratic administration which promised FEPC to the Nation in its platform. President Truman has repeated that promise. The chairman of the Rules Committee, the other Democratic leaders of this House, as well as President Truman, can have FEPC passed next Monday if they really want it. Therefore, they all have the responsibility of seeing to it that this latest maneuver of the Rules Committee be not brought up in this House before FEPC is taken up next Monday. Further, in keeping with the demands of the people of this country for civil rights, I call upon the chairman of the Rules Committee to stand by his rights and not call up this resolution for seven legislative days, so that on Monday the chips will be down and we will know in this House whether Truman and his Democratic Party meant what was in the platform or whether the platform and Truman's speeches are some more demagogy. We know what the Republican Party has done, however, in the Committee on Rules. It knifed FEPC.

THE COAL SHORTAGE

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, my home city of Royal Oak, Mich., contains about 43,000 inhabitants. It is a residential city in the metropolitan area of Detroit, made up mostly of homes of people who work in Detroit, or have their business in Detroit.

I received a telegram from the mayor of that city which I feel should be placed in the RECORD and the President given notice of existing conditions. This telegram is dated the 13th of this month, last Friday. This is what the mayor, Vernald E. Horn, has to say:

ROYAL OAK, MICH., January 13, 1950.
Hon. GEORGE A. DONDERO,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

Coal dealers in Royal Oak average only 3 or 4 days' supply of coal; a very serious situation for this residential city. Unless additional supplies of coal become available immediately, the health and safety of the community will be seriously jeopardized. We urge action to relieve coal shortage.

CITY OF ROYAL OAK, MICH.,

In a State like Michigan, where winter in January is not like the winter in southern California and Florida, people must have fuel to keep warm or they suffer. The community is in danger, and I hope something will be done, and done immediately to relieve the situation. What I say about Royal Oak can be said generally about the people of the State who use coal.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 18, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 18, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of all wisdom, away from the confusion of tongues we seek this quiet pavilion of prayer. We confess that we but grope in the darkness and that our sight is dim, our knowledge partial, and our judgments fallible.

Lift us out of our doubt and cynicism by a great faith to live by, great causes to live for. Teach us to value beauty of heart or of brain, in any strand of our common humanity, that we may become workers together with Thee in binding the races of man into that perfect unity that shall yet belt the earth with good will when Thy radiant kingdom comes. In the dear Redeemer's name we ask it. Amen.

RELEASE OF CERTAIN MARINES HELD BY COMMUNISTS—RESOLUTION OF MARINE PARENTS' CLUB, INC., CINCINNATI, OHIO

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Marine Parents' Club, Inc., of Cincinnati, Ohio, relating to the release of certain members of the Marine Corps held by the Communists.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Marine Parents' Club, Inc., of Cincinnati, Ohio, was formed and incorporated for the specific purpose of aiding and assisting members of the United States Marine Corps and their families; and

Whereas our attention has been directed by newspapers and radio to the fact that on October 19, 1948, Master Sgt. Elmer C. Bender, United States Marine Corps, and Chief Electrician's Mate William C. Smith, United States Navy, while on duty and in the service of the United States were taken prisoner after being forced to make an emergency landing behind the Communist lines; and

Whereas the State Department and other governmental agencies who could assist in having these men released have been very negligent in the matter, causing undue hardship on these men as well as untold mental agony to their families: Therefore be it

Resolved, That an appeal be made to the President of the United States, to the members of his Cabinet, and to all Senators and Representatives in Congress to the end that immediate steps be taken by the proper authorities through the International Red Cross, the United Nations, or by some foreign government who may have representatives in Communist China, to demand that these men be released at once and sent home to their families, as was recently done concerning members of our Diplomatic Corps; and be it further

Resolved, That our Government be requested to treat all Americans alike and equal, whether they be civilians, in the Diplomatic Corps, or in military service; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to all United States Senators and Congressional Representatives.

ROBERT G. GLENN,
President, the Marine Parents' Club, Inc.

INVESTIGATION OF UNITED STATES STEEL CORP.—RESOLUTION OF UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA, CIO, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a resolution adopted by the United Steelworkers of America, CIO, of Rochester, N. Y., requesting an investigation of the United States Steel Corp. relating to the price of steel.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION OF UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA, CIO, LOCAL 1498, DISTRICT 4, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

We, as a part of the national organization of the United Steelworkers of America, CIO, abandoned our wage demand in our negotiations for a new contract, in accordance with the findings of the Presidential fact-finding board.

In our negotiating conferences both union and management based their agreement on this report, and thus we were able to conclude our conferences and write a new contract with no strike involved.

We feel that the price increase, recently announced by United States Steel Corp., is a direct threat to the economy of the country and indicates a flagrant disregard of the welfare and economic stability of all the fabricators in the steel industry who are being caught in a remorseless squeeze by this monopolistic and greedy corporation.

The earnings of United States Steel, according to all accepted standards, are more than enough to absorb the cost of pensions and insurance plans embodied in their new contract with the union.

During the immediate prewar period, the war period, and the postwar period up to and including the present time, United States Steel has piled up unheard-of and undreamed-of profits. Despite this, every wage increase or other benefits, to the employee has been passed on to the fabricators or other consumers and eventually to the public and generally the price raise has been more than was actually needed to cover the so-called added expense.

We further feel that this practice is driving us inevitably toward Government control of the basic-steel industry which is something that, I am sure, no one, least of all we of the union, want.

Bearing all these facts in mind, it can only be assumed that the United States Steel Corp. is sticking to its policy of "the public be damned."

We are, therefore, on behalf of this organization, asking you in your official capacity to ask for a complete congressional investigation of the United States Steel Corp., and its subsidiaries, with a view of doing everything possible to force them to rescind their latest price increase. In that way stabilizing our economy and avoiding a ruinous strike in the steel industry at the expiration of the present contracts, which is a practical certainty if this price increase is allowed to stand.

ROBERT F. BURNETT,
President.

WILLIE MAY DORSEY

Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, reported an original resolution (S. Res. 210), which

FIVE PERCENTER INVESTIGATION—INTERIM REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS (S. REPT. NO. 1232)

Mr. HOEY. Mr. President, I submit herewith an interim report of the Investigations Subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments made to the full committee, dealing with the 5-percenter investigation conducted by the committee last summer and fall.

The subcommittee sought to elicit such information during the investigation as would serve to present a clear picture of the customs and practices engaged in by certain persons who were holding themselves out as possessing unusual facilities for having things done in Government and who were charging business men and others for the supposed influence which they possessed and for the services which they represented that they could render to those who employed them.

The report speaks for itself. The committee did not go on any punitive expedition. It sought only to find the facts and to disclose them without regard to whom they affected. There was no purpose to injure any individual or to interfere with any legitimate service rendered by either attorneys or business agents. The purpose also was to aid Government officials in the proper discharge of their duty and to safeguard them from imposition by people who might have ulterior purposes to serve. Wherever criticisms are made, they are in the public interest. The committee had no desire to either smear or clear anyone but rather to develop the facts in the hope that the public service would be improved and irregular or improper practices discontinued.

The committee sought to do constructive work. This report will be later followed by the presentation of a measure calculated to make permanent the changes and improvements which have been effected in different Government agencies and to aid the general public and especially small business men in having access to Government agencies and bureaus without the necessity of having to expend vast sums of money to obtain the information necessary to properly conduct their business with their government. It is in this spirit and for this purpose that the committee held the hearings and that this report is submitted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and printed.

PLIGHT OF CHILDREN REMOVED FROM GREECE TO EASTERN EUROPE DURING GUERRILLA WARFARE

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, on the 6th day of January, the archbishop of the Greek Orthodox Church, a very great and noble person, Archbishop Michael, honored Florida by visiting the Atlantic City of that State, Tarpon Springs. He called attention to the shocking tragedy of 28,000 Greek children being taken out of that country and distributed among other nations by the guerrillas. Following his conversation, I sent a telegram to the President urging action by our Government in the interest of the restoration of those children to their homes. I received, in response to that telegram, a letter from Hon. Matthew J. Connelly, secretary to the President, together with a communication passing between the President and the archbishop on January 6. Before offering those instruments, I ask unanimous consent to submit for appropriate reference a resolution which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate profoundly condemns the action of the Communist guerrilla forces in Greece in abducting thousands of Greek children and carrying them off into servitude in countries of eastern Europe during the course of the recent Communist guerrilla warfare in Greece, and requests the President to exert all of his powers, acting through the United Nations and other international organizations and directly with the governments of the countries where these children are confined, to the end that these thousands of children shall be speedily returned to their homes and homeland.

The resolution (S. Res. 212) submitted by Mr. PEPPER was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask unanimous consent that the documents which I have identified appear in the body of the RECORD in full at this point.

There being no objection, the documents were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TALLAHASSEE, FLA.,
January 7, 1950.

President HARRY S. TRUMAN,
The White House,
Washington, D. C.:

Yesterday while attending Epiphany day ceremonies at our beautiful Tarpon Springs, the most Hellenic city in the United States, you know, Archbishop Michael, the new Greek Orthodox bishop for North and South America, paid the highest tribute to you and to our Government for what we have done to save and to help the Greek people. While the archbishop reported that our program had achieved most satisfying progress in protecting the security and promoting the economic recovery of Greece, the archbishop told of how the heart of the Greek people bled for 28,000 of their children who had been kidnaped and carried off into Communist servitude by guerrillas and expressed the fervent hope that the President and our country would take the determined initiative through the United Nations and with the governments of the countries where these kidnaped children are confined, to restore them to their homes and to their homeland. While the archbishop hopes to have the opportunity when he visits Washington to discuss this matter with the President personally, I assured him of the very deep interest of the people of Florida and myself in this great humanitarian project and that I would immediately address this message to the President. I know how deeply you have been personally moved by this shocking outrage to humanity and that you have been doing and will continue to do everything in your power and in the power of our Government to bring these children back to their parents. I have assured the archbishop that I am confident Congress will cooperate in every possible way and that I proposed to bring up the matter in the Foreign Relations Committee and the Senate upon my return to Washington next week. I shall look forward to discussing this matter with you personally at first opportunity I have for personal conference.

Most sincerely,

CLAUDE PEPPER,
United States Senator.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 9, 1950.

Hon. CLAUDE PEPPER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR PEPPER: The President has asked me to acknowledge the receipt of the telegram which you sent him from Tallahassee and to assure you of his appreciation of your interest in wiring as you did.

Last Friday the President sent a message to His Grace Michael, Orthodox archbishop of North and South America, in response to an appeal which he had received from Archbishop Michael regarding the plight of the children removed from Greece to eastern Europe during the course of the recent guerrilla warfare. A copy of the exchange of messages between the President and Archbishop Michael is attached for your information and convenient reference.

With kind regards,

Very sincerely yours,

MATTHEW J. CONNELLY,
Secretary to the President.

JANUARY 6, 1950.

The President today sent the following message to His Grace Michael, Orthodox archbishop of North and South America:

"In response to your appeal, I am glad to assure you that the United States will continue to give the utmost support to the efforts of the United Nations and the international Red Cross organizations to bring about the return to Greece of the thousands of children removed from that country to eastern Europe during the course of the recent guerrilla warfare. The people of the United States, and particularly the mothers of the United States, are deeply sensitive to the plight of these children and their bereaved families. We pray that the governments of the countries harboring these children will be moved by a spirit of broad humanitarianism to cooperate in fulfilling the unanimous desire of the United Nations General Assembly that these children be promptly restored to their homes.

"HARRY S. TRUMAN."

Following is the text of the message sent to the President by Archbishop Michael:

"Just from Greece as the new spiritual leader of the Greek-American Orthodox people in your and our prosperous and beloved country. I make today an appeal to the civilized humanity and generous American people for the return to their parents of the abducted Greek children. Our Orthodox people here and in Greece who are so grateful to you and to the American people for all given assistance will count very much on your personality. Will you please exercise all your high influence upon the members of the United Nations so that these Greek children are returned to their homes?

"MICHAEL,
"Archbishop of North and South America."

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, there is now pending to the oleo bill an amendment proposing to add as a rider the antilynching bill. I believe similar amendments proposing to add the FEPC bill and the anti-poll-tax bill as riders to the oleo bill will also be offered Therefore I should like to address my remarks to all those riders, although but one is pending at the moment.

Mr. President, I am going to vote to table further discussion of the civil-rights amendments which have or will be proposed as riders on the bill to repeal the Federal taxes on oleomargarine. However, I want the RECORD to be absolutely clear as to why I am supporting the motion to lay these amendments on the table.

In the first place, I think it is imperative that we identify these riders for what they are. The so-called civil-rights riders are designed to kill oleo tax repeal. They have that purpose, and no other purpose. The riders are not intended to give us, in a single package, both repeal of oleo taxes and civil rights. It is simply a cut-rate device to kill two birds with one stone.

We are told that a vote in favor of tabling the amendments is a vote against civil rights. This is categorically untrue—and I believe this may be proved with what approaches mathematical exactness. I am happy, incidentally, to report that such responsible organizations as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People recognize that the amendments are being attempted here for the wrong purpose.

Mr. President, I understand that the majority leader will address himself in detail to a telegram which has been received from the acting secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in which he has made very clear the position of his organization in regard to these amendments. Therefore, I shall not burden the Senate with a discussion of the opinions of that organization, inasmuch as the distinguished majority leader will, I understand, address himself to that subject. But I ask unanimous consent that the telegram be printed in full at this point in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator FRANCIS J. MYERS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People we urge the defeat of the so-called civil-rights amendments offered by Senator WILLIAM LANGER to H. R. 2023, the bill to repeal oleomargarine tax. As you know, this association since its inception 40 years ago has worked unceasingly to win for all persons, regardless of race, religion, or nationality, security of person and freedom of political and economic opportunity. Senator LANGER does not intend for his amendments to further the cause of civil rights. He desires only to defeat the oleomargarine-tax repeal. Senator LANGER made this clear in his speech on the Senate floor January 11 when he charged that the passage of H. R. 2023 "Will ruin thousands of farmers in the State of North Dakota." Last year, this association actively supported amendments to prohibit racial segregation in housing and education when respective bills were before the Senate. Racial discrimination in both of these fields is widely practiced and should be banned in all Federal aid to such programs. Lynching, poll taxes, and other such civil-rights questions are not, however, germane to, or involved in, the repeal of the oleomargarine taxes. We, therefore, urge the defeat of the so-called Langer civil-rights amendments.

ROY WILKINS,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I feel that this telegram alone should serve to make it clear that a vote to lay the civil-rights amendments on the table is not a vote against the merits of those issues, but I feel that I should make some further explanation as to why I shall support the motion to table the amendments.

I shall begin, however, by reaffirming my position regarding these two completely unrelated issues which have been brought together before us.

First, I want to see the discriminatory Federal taxes on oleomargarine done away with—and I want to see that done now.

Secondly—and I am sure there is no Member of this body who does not already know this—I have consistently fought for civil rights at every opportunity which has presented itself during the years I have been in the Congress. I have fought for them outside the Congress as well. I have fought for them because of the sincere conviction that the American spirit of fair play and justice, by its very definition, insists that no person be discriminated against in his work, in his beliefs, or in his living, because of his race or because of the color of his skin. That has been my position. It is still my position.

Yet, Mr. President, I intend to vote to stop, here and now, any further discussion of civil rights, and get on with the business of repealing the oleo taxes.

Why do I make that statement? The reasons are to be found, fundamentally, in several technical requirements of the rules under which the Senate conducts its business as a legislative body. Once those rules are clearly understood, the reasons for voting to table the motion are obvious.

To begin with, the pending business of the Senate at this instant is the bill to repeal Federal taxes on oleo. Amendments which have been called up for debate would add to that bill sections providing for a number of civil-rights laws. These amendments are not germane to the oleo bill. They have nothing to do with that bill. Furthermore—and this is also an important consideration—separate legislative committees of the Congress have jurisdiction over these unrelated issues.

During the course of our debate on these amendments, a motion will be made to lay the amendments on the table; in other words, that we abandon further discussion of them.

Let us consider, then, just what it is we shall be doing in voting on the motion to lay the amendments on the table. A vote in favor of tabling merely means that we are abandoning at this time further debate on the merits of the amendments. A vote against tabling means we wish to continue discussing civil rights.

Thus, a vote against the motion does not do anything more than keep the discussion alive. It does not tie the amendments to the oleo bill. If, by refusing to table, we continue discussing the amendments, I think it is clear to all of us that a filibuster will result, because those who oppose civil-rights legislation do not wish to see the Senate reach a vote on the riders.

Assuming, then, that a filibuster develops, in the event we do not table the rider proposals, what happens when we seek to apply cloture and cut off debate? This is the critical point to an understanding of the entire question before us. A cloture petition, by the requirements of rule XXII, can be applied only to the business then pending in the Senate, which now is the oleo bill. Rule XXII also specifically rules out the consideration of any matter not germane to the pending business—and thus the civil-rights amendments would be automatically stripped away on a point of order, because clearly they are not germane to the oleo bill.

So, if cloture is invoked, we have merely limited debate on the oleo bill—minus any pending amendments that are not germane—and there is nothing whatsoever in the Senate rules which will permit us to limit debate on an amendment to the oleo bill if the amendment is not germane. In other words, a vote which would follow a cloture ruling would be a vote on the merits of the oleo bill alone.

I invite any Member of the Senate to suggest to me now any conceivable technique under the Senate rules which will permit us to invoke cloture in such a fashion that we may come to a vote squarely on the issue of appending the civil-rights amendments to the oleo bill. This simply is not possible—period.

Debate on these amendments can be endless, or, at least, they can be filibustered as long as those opposed to them wish to filibuster them. So I conclude that we all agree there is little hope of ending such a filibuster if we cannot invoke cloture to assist us.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MYERS. I am happy to yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. Aside from the technical grounds which the Senator has so ably urged—and I take it that he is completely sound in his position—is it not true that the practical effect of attaching civil-rights amendments to the pending oleomargarine tax repeal bill would be to join together as opponents of the measure, as it would then exist, those who oppose the repeal of the oleomargarine tax and those who oppose the civil-rights program, with the result that under those circumstances it would become impossible to obtain the votes of a majority of the Members of the Senate in favor of such a joinder of issues in this one bill?

Mr. MYERS. I say to the distinguished junior Senator from Florida there can be no question about that. As I said earlier in my remarks, that is the purpose of such amendments. Their purpose is to kill the oleomargarine tax repeal bill. In fact, I think it has been stated here on the floor that some of the opponents of the oleomargarine tax repeal bill will use any tactics to gain their objective, namely, to defeat that bill.

So, what is the answer to all this, Mr. President? The answer is that there is no possible way in which we may get a clearly defined vote on the civil-rights amendments to the oleo bill unless we wear out a filibuster; and that, I submit, is the hard way to achieve civil rights.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator has referred to wearing out a filibuster. If the filibuster were worn out, the amendments would be germane; would they not?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; but if cloture were invoked, the amendments would not be germane.

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, there is an easier way—a direct way—in which we may come to a clear-cut vote on the merits of such civil-rights legislation as FEPC, and that way is to bring up the FEPC bill pending now on the Senate Calendar. When the FEPC bill, standing on its own legislative feet, is before us, we can file a cloture petition to limit the debate on it. Thereupon if, under the new rule XXII, which was adopted last winter over my protest, for I felt it would make cloture harder to obtain, we are successful in getting 64 Senators to vote to apply cloture on the FEPC debate, we then can go on to vote on the bill a short time later.

I want to say something further at this time to some of my colleagues in the Senate who, like myself, have strong convictions in favor of FEPC. Some of these Senators are troubled by the assertion that if they vote to table discussion of the civil-rights amendments, they are, in effect, voting against FEPC, antilynch, anti-poll tax, and others. Some of the same Senators are troubled, too, that they may not have another opportunity during this session of the Congress to bring the FEPC issue squarely into focus and vote on it. To them I say that in his message to the Congress, on January 4 of this year, President Truman called upon us to enact the FEPC law and the other civil-rights measures. The distinguished majority leader of the Senate, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] has repeatedly stated for himself, and for the majority policy committee of the Senate, of which both he and I are members, that we fully intend to schedule debate on the pending FEPC bill early in this session of the Congress. He has reiterated that pledge just recently. I, as a member of the majority policy committee, also give my solemn pledge that I shall work unrelentingly to bring up the FEPC bill. Furthermore, I am prepared to state as my unqualified belief that we will debate FEPC on its own merits in a very short time.

The reasons I have already stated are sufficient in themselves to show conclusively that we could not possibly be successful in amending the oleo bill to include the civil rights riders, and, what is more, that we cannot bring the Senate to a vote on the merits of the riders short of breaking a filibuster without benefit of cloture.

There are, however, other very good reasons for voting to lay the amendments on the table. I am convinced that the riders are devices to launch an unrestrained filibuster. It is perfectly evident that the amendment has no other purpose than to kill the oleo bill.

As all of us are aware, we have in the Senate no rule of germaneness, apart from the restriction which applies to general appropriations bills—no rule, in other words, that, at least theoretically, prevents us from trying to wed together completely unrelated issues.

We know, too, that nongermane riders have been used repeatedly in the past to kill legislation, which otherwise could be passed, because we have numerical majorities great enough to do so. It is obvious that the technique of attempting nongermane amendments is, as the Senator from Florida just said, a technique merely to divide our strength and to defeat our efforts to pass measures which we are otherwise in a position to pass.

I therefore wish to submit the thought, Mr. President, that we have ahead of us in this session a great deal of vital legislation, on which, taken individually, bill after bill will be passed, if we confine our discussion to one issue at a time. If we fail to discipline ourselves, if we fail to stick to a self-imposed rule of germaneness, we shall stand helplessly by, watching measure after measure go down in defeat through the mechanism of nongermane riders, which will tie us up in knots, or cut away the voting strength of the majorities who support the individual bills.

So, Mr. President, I repeat the thought I suggested in the opening of my remarks: Let us recognize the civil rights riders for what they are. Let us vote to lay them on the table, and let us get down to the business of repealing the oleo taxes. And then, when FEPC comes before the Senate, as I am confident it will come, shortly, let us confine ourselves to the merits of FEPC and not be side-tracked at that time by the efforts which will be made to kill it through the technique of some other nongermane rider designed to produce a stalemate.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. I notice the Senator is asking that no vote be taken on the antilynching bill which the Senator from North Dakota has sponsored and which is now on the calendar, but the Senator wants to vote on it later. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania, as the whip on the Democratic side, consent to taking it up and making it the next regular order of business in the Senate? If it is not germane to the pending bill, will the Senator see that it is brought before the Senate as the next order of business?

Mr. MYERS. That is something, as the Senator from Michigan knows, which I cannot decide. I think the Senator should be well satisfied with the assurance and promise of the able majority leader, a man of integrity, that the Senate will have an opportunity to vote on some of the civil-rights bills at an early date. The majority leader and the majority policy committee have a program. They have other things to consider, too. The basing-point bill, by order of the Senate, is to be taken up Friday. I know how greatly interested the Senator from Michigan is in the displaced-persons bill, which, by order of the Senate, will be back on the calendar on the 25th. We have much important business, but I think, when the majority leader gives the Senate his word that civil-rights legislation, in which I am just as much interested as is the Senator from Michigan, will be brought up at a very early date, the Senator should be well satisfied with the promise and assurance of the majority leader.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield further to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. MYERS. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from Michigan merely wants to say that in the number of years he has been in the Senate, he has always seen that the bill in question has not been on the program, insofar as coming to a vote is concerned. We find civil-rights bills introduced from year to year, during which time, with the exception of 2 years, the present majority has been in power. The majority party does not bring them up at a time when the Senate could really get a vote on them, which is early in the session. That is why the Senator from Michigan feels that he will vote not to table the amendment, because the time is ripe. If it is desired to pass a bill on this subject, let us pass it now.

Mr. MYERS. I may say to the Senator, I have been endeavoring to be very factual in the matter, and I have not injected politics into it. It was not my intention to inject politics into the subject, because I am interested in getting a repeal of the tax on oleo.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania consider it to be the injection of politics because a Republican rises——

Mr. MYERS. Let me finish.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I demand the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is that the Senator from Pennsylvania may yield for a question only.

Mr. MYERS. Let me finish. I said I had endeavored to approach the question through the rules, and to discuss it dispassionately. The Senator has mentioned that the Democratic Party has been the majority party for a good many years, and that we have not brought up certain of these bills. I may say to the Senator that the first order of business in the Eighty-first Congress was a motion to change the rules. We were not successful. We got a bad cloture rule. We made an effort to support the decision of the Vice President. The first order of business was the motion to change the rules, which was the most important thing in the consideration of civil-rights legislation. But I may say to the Senator that the bill in question was on the calendar for 15 months during the Eightieth Congress, during which time no attempt was made to bring it up.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. MYERS. I yield for a question.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania know where the junior Senator from Michigan stood on the question of the cloture rule?

Mr. MYERS. I know definitely.

Mr. FERGUSON. The Senator from Michigan stood alongside the Senator from Pennsylvania, did he not?

Mr. MYERS. Definitely; and he did everything in his power to see to it that a real change in the rules was finally accomplished. We were unsuccessful. But, as I have already said, there is no possible way in which we can get civil-rights legislation during a discussion of the oleo bill, without a prolonged filibuster, and without breaking a filibuster without benefit of cloture. So I say let us confine ourselves to the merits of FEPC and civil-rights legislation, and not be sidetracked by the efforts which will be made to kill it through the technique of some other nongermane rider designed to produce a stalemate.

A rule of germaneness is a good rule—and even though our official rules of the Senate do not impose that limitation upon us other than in the instance of general appropriation bills, we can impose one upon ourselves, and thus make it possible by the end of the second session of the Eighty-first Congress to come up with a record of achievement which all of us may view with pride. The alternative of being bogged down with death-dealing riders, by a refusal to lay them on the table each time they are brought up, is an alternative I do not like to contemplate.

I trust and hope, therefore, that when a motion is made to table the riders the motion will prevail.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Some time ago, in a conference of the Democratic Members of the Senate, we went on record as being opposed to all amendments during the present session of Congress which were not germane to an issue pending before the Senate. It is my studied opinion that we took a remarkable step in the direction of more orderly procedure in the Senate, so far as expediting the business of the Senate is concerned. The amendment pending before the Senate at the present time, as everyone knows, is utterly irrelevant to the issue we are now debating. It is a classical example of what can be done in the Senate under the rules as they now exist. I prophesy that, sooner or later, as a result of the tremendous amount of work the Senate has before it in these days of domestic and world problems, the Senate ultimately will bring in a rule under which no amendment to an issue pending before the Senate, unless germane, shall be considered. That is the rule in the House of Representatives. There is absolutely no reason, so far as I can see, why the Senate, if it desires to expedite its business, should not have a similar rule.

We have the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, seeking to attach the antilynching bill to a bill to repeal the tax on oleomargarine—two bills which are just as far apart as the two poles, Mr. President. Yet, under the rules of the Senate, the Senator from North Dakota is permitted to do that. We are compelled to take the time of individual Senators to debate, vote, and raise parliamentary situations, to reach a final conclusion upon it.

Mr. President, no one is being deceived as a result of what my distinguished friend from North Dakota is doing in connection with the offering of his amendment. My friend waited until the Wiley-Gillette substitute was defeated before he offered the amendment to the original bill. I am sure he would now admit that had the Wiley-Gillette substitute been adopted, he would not have delayed the Senate by offering this kind of an amendment to the oleomargarine bill. In other words, the Senator from North Dakota was more interested, and rightly so from his viewpoint, in killing the repeal of the margarine tax than in any other one thing. He made his position clear on the floor of the Senate. He debated the issue at great length, which it was his right, of course, to do. But the Senator from North Dakota knows that as a result of offering his amendment he may cause a filibuster to start which will ultimately defeat the repeal of the oleomargarine tax. That is what he hopes to do. That is the real reason for the offering of the amendment. Every Senator knows that to be so, and the country knows it. The Senator from North Dakota is not deceiving the people who are truly interested in passing a civil-rights program.

Mr. President, I want to read into the RECORD at this time two telegrams from organizations which are vitally concerned with civil rights. They are more interested in civil rights than they are in the repeal of the margarine tax, so far as that goes, but at the same time they do not want to see civil rights riders placed on the bill, because they know the reason why such a maneuver is being attempted.

The first telegram which I wish to read is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 17, 1950.

Hon. SCOTT W. LUCAS,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Our organizations stand stanchly in support of the President's civil-rights program. The national emergency civil-rights mobilization has demonstrated the fullness of our support for this program. However, we do not favor the proposed civil-rights riders to the oleo tax-repeal measure. We believe that these riders, if adopted, would insure the defeat of oleo tax repeal. We strongly urge that you not allow the great issue of civil rights to be misused so as to defeat programs designed to benefit the economic welfare of the great majority of Americans.

Roy Wilkins, Acting Executive Secretary, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Violet M. Gunther, Legislative Representative, Americans for Democratic Action; Lewis Hines, Special Representative, American Federation of Labor; George L. P. Weaver, National CIO; Elmer Henderson, Director, American Council of Human Rights; Michael Straight, Chairman, American Veterans Committee; Herman Edelsberg, Washington Representative, Antidefamation League, B'nai B'rith.

The telegram refers to the issue of civil rights being misused. That is exactly what is attempted to be done by this sort of an amendment.

The next telegram which I wish to read comes from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 16, 1950.

Senator SCOTT LUCAS,
The Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People we urge the defeat of the so-called civil-rights amendments offered by Senator WILLIAM LANGER to H. R. 2023, the bill to repeal oleomargarine tax. As you know, this association since its inception 40 years ago has worked unceasingly to win for all persons, regardless of race, religion, or nationality, security of person and freedom of political and economic opportunity. Senator LANGER does not intend for his amendments to further the cause of civil rights, he desires only to defeat the oleomargarine tax repeal. Senator LANGER made this clear in his speech on the Senate floor January 11 when he charged that the passage of H. R. 2023 "will ruin thousands of farmers in the State of North Dakota." Last year this association actively supported amendments to prohibit racial segregation in housing and education when respective bills were before the Senate. Racial discrimination in both of these fields is widely practiced and should be banned in all Federal aid to such programs. Lynching, poll taxes, and other such civil-rights questions are not, however, germane to, or involved in, the repeal of the oleomargarine taxes; we therefore urge the defeat of the so-called Langer civil-rights amendments.

ROY WILKINS,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. President, I have read these telegrams into the RECORD to advise the Members of the Senate that those who are deeply interested in the passage of civil-rights legislation are unalterably opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Some statements have been made with reference to those who support amendments of this kind or who may be instrumental in the sponsoring of such amendments. It has been said that they are doing it for one purpose, and for one purpose only, and that is to defeat the repeal of the margarine tax. I should like to absolve any Member of the Senate on the Democratic side of the aisle, who has been opposed to the repeal of the oleomargarine tax and has represented his constituency in the dairy sections of the country ably and well, of being in any way responsible for the offering of this amendment. I should like to state, Mr. President, that in due course of this session the Senator from Illinois, the majority leader, having discussed the subject with the policy committee, and a majority of that committee having agreed with him, we shall be constrained to take up certain phases of the civil-rights program. I can assure my friends on both sides of the aisle that that will be done, and the first issue which will come before the Senate is the FEPC bill which is now on the calendar ready for action. There will be no question about that, Mr. President.

I sincerely hope that those Senators who supported the present cloture rule, which provides that 64 Members of the Senate must vote for cloture before we can get a vote on a bill, will remember, when the civil-rights bills come before the Senate, the vote they took to fasten that rule upon the Senate, and will vote to give us an opportunity to pass upon such legislation when the time comes.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss that issue, because it is not germane at this particular time.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate of the United States, Democrats and Republicans alike, will vote to table the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota because of what seems to me the unanswerable arguments which have been made against it.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable

So Mr. FULBRIGHT's motion to lay Mr. LANGER's amendment on the table was agreed to.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I shall not take the time of the Senate, but I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the body of the RECORD, at this point, a brief statement setting out the fact that I favor the passage of the pending bill. I voted against the substitute, and I am opposed to all irrelevant amendments which may be offered thereto.

I send my statement to the desk for incorporation in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, Mr. PEPPER'S statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, under the present law housewives of America are compelled to pay a tax of 10 cents a pound for colored oleomargarine and ¼ cent a pound for uncolored margarine. In addition, the manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers must pay license fees to the Federal Government. The total revenue from these taxes and fees has risen from $1,347,190 to an estimated $16,000,000 in 1950.

This tax on oleomargarine is unfair and discriminatory. What we are doing by keeping this tax is to raise the cost of living of the American families with lower incomes, who are the prime purchasers of oleomargarine, colored or uncolored. It is a burden on the housewives in these families who have the problem of providing a decent fare for their husbands and children.

The amount of the tax may be small to some people, but it is, I am sure, large to the nearly 16,000,000 families and individuals in the United States who have incomes under $2,000, and probably to the 23,000,000 who have incomes between $2,000 and $5,000.

Oleomargarine is a good food. It has been established that it is as nutritious and digestible as butter. Nowadays manufacturers add the necessary vitamins to oleomargarine which puts it on a par with butter.

Mr. President, I am going to vote for the bill which has been reported by the Senate Committee on Finance. This bill would remove the Federal taxes and license fees on oleomargarine. It would continue to require reporting by manufacturers and wholesalers. It would permit yellow oleomargarine to move freely across State lines.

It would prevent adulterated and misbranded colored margarine from being served or sold in public places. Colored oleomargarine must be clearly identified as such. Misrepresentation of oleomargarine as butter is prohibited by section 5 (a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act, and we know that the Commission has promptly acted against labeling and advertising practices which were deceptive in confusing oleomargarine with butter. Under the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act the Federal Security Administrator has established a standard of identity for oleomargarine and he has the power to prevent the shipment of any adulterated or misbranded oleomargarine in interstate commerce.

Mr. President, when the Congress repeals the oleomargarine tax it will be helping the housewives of America. This bill would add to and raise our national levels of nutrition and health. Increased production of oleomargarine would expand the market for our southern products, such as cottonseed oil, and soybean oil, which are used by manufacturers of nutritious oleomargarine. Therefore I hope in the interest of fairness and the general welfare of the people this bill, too long delayed, will speedily become law.

NOMINATION OF ADMIRAL FORREST SHERMAN TO BE CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, the other day the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] asked unanimous consent for the consideration by the Senate of the nomination of Admiral Forrest Sherman to be Chief of Naval Operations. At that time I objected, but not because I did not think Admiral Sherman would make a great Chief of Naval Operations. I know him by reputation to be the finest type of service officer; a man of outstanding ability and experience.

But I have here today a photostat of an official document which I intend to read to the Senate, which raises questions of a vastly more important nature than the mere confirmation of the nomination of any man to any post.

It brings up the very important question of whether the office of Chief of Naval Operations is now actually vacant. It brings up also the more important question of whether the Secretary of the Navy is a man who is completely incompetent or whether the other day before the Armed Services Committee he was just plain untruthful.

This document and the facts which I am about to discuss should bring to my colleagues the question of whether they actually have the power to appoint a Chief of Naval Operations to his statutory term of two full years. It raises the question of whether confirmation means that the Chief of Naval Operations may hold office for 1 day, 1 week, or 1 month—depending upon the extent to which he is willing to be a yes-man.

I specifically call the attention of the chairman and the members of the Armed Services Committee to the question whether there actually is a vacancy in the post of Chief of Naval Operations to which Admiral Sherman can be appointed, or whether the job is already filled by Admiral Denfeld, who as we all know is not physically occupying his post, but who as most of us do not know was commissioned to it for a 2-year term on September 14, 1949.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. My advices are that there is a vacancy in the office of the Chief of Naval Operations at this time.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] in arriving at that conclusion, depends upon the testimony given by Secretary Matthews. Is that correct?

Mr. TYDINGS. Largely. As I understand the situation, Admiral Denfeld was nominated by the President; his nomination came to the Senate; the Committee on Armed Services held hearings and recommended the confirmation of Admiral Denfeld. After the Senate had acted and the matter went to the President, the President did not issue the commission. Therefore, there was no confirmed appointee in the job.

In the celebrated case of Marbury against Madison a similar question came before the Supreme Court of the United States, in which case the Supreme Court held that the President had the right not to issue a commission to an appointee, although he had been confirmed by the Senate; that the appointing power, notwithstanding confirmation, held good all the way up to the time of the issuing of the commission.

Mr. McCARTHY. May I interrupt the Senator? If the commission had been issued, then the Senator would say that there now is no vacancy?

Mr. TYDINGS. If the commission had been issued, in the judgment of the Senator from Maryland, without study into the matter, I would assume that there would be no vacancy until the term for which the admiral had been appointed had expired. Whether or not in that contingency the President would have the right of removal is not before the Senate, and the Senator from Maryland would not want to pass on it without more study as to the precedents, the law, and the circumstances that might enter into it.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. How many more situations have existed exactly the same as the one which has just been described, namely that the Senate has confirmed someone and the President has refused to issue a commission?

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. No, Mr. President, not for a minute. Before yielding I want to read this document, which I think will make unnecessary many of the questions which would otherwise be asked. I very much wish the Senator from Maryland would remain in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the Senator from Maryland has an important engagement at 1 o'clock and he must leave shortly. So if there are any questions which the Senator from Wisconsin desires to address to the Senator from Maryland, the Senator from Maryland would be grateful if he would do so in the immediate future, because I cannot remain much longer without breaking my engagement entirely. I did not know the Senator from Wisconsin was going to speak now or I would have postponed the engagement if that had been possible.

Mr. McCARTHY. There are some things to which I will call the Senator's attention in the next 2 or 3 minutes before he leaves, which I think he will consider of vast importance.

Mr. President, we must decide whether or not Admiral Denfeld has been legally removed before we can put another man in his place.

The law provides for not more than a total of 4 years' term of office as Chief of Naval Operations upon appointment by the President and confirmation by the Senate. The act did not provide that the Chief of Naval Operations could be removed at the pleasure of the President or the whim of the Secretary of the Navy.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in a unanimous decision handed down on May 27, 1935, held in the celebrated Humphreys case that the President of the United States could not remove a Government official in disregard of a fixed term prescribed by the Congress.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I should like to continue for a short while. Let me speak for about three minutes more and then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the Senator wants to keep his facts straight as he goes along.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will not yield for about 3 minutes, and then I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin refuses to yield now.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will yield in about 3 minutes. There are some facts I want to bring to the Senator's mind before he asks any more questions, because the Senator might be embarrassed by reason of the questions he may ask before first getting these facts.

Mr. TYDINGS. No, I will not be embarrassed by reason of any questions I may ask. I should like to have the Senator yield to me now.

Mr. McCARTHY. In the Humphreys case the Court held that there was insufficient cause to remove a public servant in disregard of a fixed term prescribed by Congress simply because his thoughts did not coincide with those of the Chief Executive. The Supreme Court wisely said:

> It is quite evident that one who holds his office only during the pleasure of another cannot be depended upon to maintain an attitude of independence against the latter's will.

You, Mr. President, were a Member of the Senate at the time we passed the unification bill. You will recall that after careful study and thought, the Senate and the House, without a dissenting vote to that provision, decided that the term of office should be for a fixed term. On that point there can be no question. If we intended that he could be removed at the whim or caprice of the Secretary of the Navy, we would have so provided.

Mr. President, on the afternoon of last October 27, President Truman announced to a news conference that Admiral Denfeld was being replaced as Chief of Naval Operations.

Last week, Secretary of Navy Francis P. Matthews appeared before the Senate Armed Services Committee to support the nomination of Admiral Sherman as Chief of Naval Operations.

He testified, in effect, that a vacancy existed in the post of Chief of Naval Operations because this document did not exist. Therefore, Mr. Matthews reasoned, he was entitled to appoint a new man to this vacant post. His testimony was to the effect that if the document which I now hold in my hand were in existence, then there would not be a vacancy in the post of Chief of Naval Operations.

I gather from what the Senator from Maryland has just said that he also agrees with that. Before reading this document, I should like to refer to Mr. Matthews' testimony.

Incidentally, can the Senator tell me whether Mr. Matthews was under oath when he was before the committee?

Mr. TYDINGS. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. He was not?

Mr. TYDINGS. No.

Will the Senator yield to me, Mr. President?

Mr. McCARTHY. In a moment.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wish to answer the question, but I wish to do so in a parliamentary way.

Mr. McCARTHY. Very well; I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. So far as I recall, Mr. Matthews was not under oath; and no member of the committee, either Democratic or Republican, requested that he testify under oath. Otherwise, the oath would have been administered.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], who was on the Armed Services Committee, asked some questions which are very pertinent. I read now from portions of the Secretary of Navy's testimony as it appears on pages 94 and 95 of the hearings before the Armed Services Committee last week:

> Senator KNOWLAND. My recollection is that on or about the 15th of August, the former Chief of Naval Operations was confirmed by the Senate, and his name was sent up; is that approximately correct?
> Secretary MATTHEWS. I would say about that time.
> Senator KNOWLAND. You were Secretary of the Navy at the time?
> Secretary MATTHEWS. I was Secretary; yes.
> Senator KNOWLAND. How long is the term of Chief of Naval Operations?
> Secretary MATTHEWS. The term for which Admiral Denfeld was appointed the first time was 2 years.
> Senator KNOWLAND. Was the appointment on August 15, 1949, presumably for a 2-year term?
> Secretary MATTHEWS. A second term of 2 years; yes, sir.
> Senator KNOWLAND. Could you inform the committee as to how it happened that there is a vacancy in the office?
> Secretary MATTHEWS. Well, at the present time the vacancy occurs by the fact that Admiral Denfeld's first term has expired and he never has been appointed for a second term. His name was suggested, he was confirmed, but his commission was never issued to him.

With that information before the Armed Services Committee, I think the committee was perfectly justified in assuming that there was a vacancy.

I read further:

> Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Secretary, I do not want to break in, but Admiral Denfeld never, then, was the Chief of Operations for the second term?

Secretary MATTHEWS. No, sir.

Senator BRIDGES. The Senate confirmed him.

Secretary MATTHEWS. But that was, as I understand it, the confirmation was if the President wishes to appoint him, but he never appointed him for the second term. He never issued the commission.

Mr. President, in that connection I should like to read from this document. The one I hold in my hand is a photostatic copy of the commission, which was issued to Admiral Denfeld. The original is in his possession.

This is the commission which Secretary Matthews told the Armed Services Committee did not exist. It is Admiral Denfeld's commission as Chief of Naval Operations. It runs from December 15, 1949, to December 15, 1951. It is dated September 14, 1949. It is signed, Mr. President, by Francis P. Matthews and Harry S. Truman. It says that Harry S. Truman and Francis P. Matthews repose "special trust and confidence in the patriotism, fidelity, and abilities of Admiral Louis E. Denfeld." This is the commission which Secretary Matthews told the committee did not exist. I assure the Senate that it does exist.

Now I should like to ask the very able Senator who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee whether he thinks it might be well, before bringing Admiral Sherman's nomination before the Senate on the question of confirmation, for the committee to go into the question, to determine whether we would be considering the confirmation of a nomination for a position which already is filled.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, of course what the Senator from Wisconsin has read as the testimony of Secretary Matthews is accurate, as I recall it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. My recollection is that the Secretary testified before the committee that although Admiral Denfeld had been confirmed yet, so he said, according to my recollection the commission had not been issued.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. And as I recall the testimony, I think it is exactly as the Senator from Wisconsin has read it.

The existence of the commission would, of course, create a situation different from that which existed in the committee at the time when the committee acted upon the nomination of Admiral Sherman. The Senator from Maryland has had no occasion to make an examination of the facts regarding whether the President of the United States can, after the issuance of a commission of the kind the Senator from Wisconsin has produced, remove the man who holds the place, and put another man in that place. Offhand, and without any examination of the precedents, the Senator from Maryland is inclined to believe that if the President desires to remove the Chief of Naval Operations or the Chief of Staff of the Army or the Chief of Staff of the Air Force, during the term for which he is commissioned, perhaps the President, as Commander in Chief, has that right.

However, in order to be fair with the Senator, let me say that I have never had occasion to look up the precedents. I may be wrong, and I am not asserting this today as any profound opinion. I am only trying to answer the Senator from such information as I have available, and therefore I cannot give him an opinion based upon precedents; and so forth, which would be the only fair answer to the Senator's question.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. First let me say that I wish to thank the Senator from Maryland. In my opinion, knowing the high type of man that Admiral Denfeld is, I think if the President were to say to him, "Admiral, we want you to resign," then, regardless of whether the President had the power to remove him or not, I am sure Admiral Denfeld would resign.

However, when the President and Secretary Matthews, without even consulting Admiral Denfeld, without even informing him of the action they were going to take, announced at a press conference that he was being booted out, and finally, a day or several days later, called in Admiral Denfeld, and told him, "You have been fired," I think it is definitely incumbent upon us, before we take any action on a subsequent nomination to the same position, to determine whether or not, as of today, there is a Chief of Naval Operations.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WITHERS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, whether it was brought to the attention of the Armed Services Committee that any order of the kind to which he has referred—in other words, an order of removal—had been issued by the President?

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not have the papers before me, and of course I may be wrong. But my recollection is that we were notified that the position was vacant.

Mr. KEM. That is an entirely different matter, of course, from an order removing the occupant of the office. A notice that the post is vacant is one thing; an order of removal is another. I think the Senator will agree with me as to that.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin that, speaking for both myself and all other members of the Armed Services Committee, of both political persuasions—I am sure I can include all of them in what I am about to say—we have no desire or wish or intention to take advantage of the Senate in any matter which is in dispute.

My suggestion is that, so long as this matter has been raised, the nomination of Admiral Sherman remain on the calendar, where it now is; and we shall try to get some precedents either for or against or on both sides; and upon the ascertainment of what the precedents and the law seem to portray, the Senator from Maryland in complete frankness will try to be governed accordingly, in fairness to his own committee, as well as to the Senate.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like to address a question to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. McCARTHY. I shall yield in a moment.

I may say that I am not in any way attempting to cast any reflection upon the members of the Armed Services Committee. When the Secretary of the Navy comes before the committee and in unqualified terms says the commission never was signed, and says that neither the President nor he ever signed it, I do not believe that under normal circumstances it was incumbent upon the members of the committee to assume that either the Secretary of the Navy was lying or that he did not recall signing the commission. I think the members of the committee were justified in relying upon what the Secretary of the Navy told them. So I wish to make clear that this is no criticism whatsoever of the members of the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield at this point, I shall be grateful to him.

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am grateful to the Senator for yielding, because I do not want to leave the floor, if I do leave it, with any room for misinterpretation or misunderstanding.

I have the very highest regard for Admiral Denfeld. I consider him a very fine and outstanding naval officer.

The dispute which led up to this controversy occurred in another body, to wit, the House of Representatives. The Armed Services Committee of the Senate and the chairman of the Armed Services Committee have, in the main—not in all cases—looked upon this controversy as one which was more or less, in the nature of things, under the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives; and we have tried to give the House of Representatives precedence in determining whether or not they thought what happened was fair or unfair, because they were the tribunal, one might say, before which the controversy took place and before which the promises of no reprisal were made.

Therefore, having very able and eminent men on that committee, we did not want to arrogate or delegate to ourselves the jurisdiction of a matter in which the House of Representatives was already engaged. Therefore, what we have done has not been in condonation of what has taken place or in condemnation of what has taken place. That dispute so far has been on the other side.

I wish the Senator to know that in making answers to his questions, I am not taking an adverse position to whatever side Admiral Denfeld may have, nor am I necessarily approving what Admiral Denfeld has done or said. The matter has been in the House of Representatives, and we have acted in a more constrained area, to wit, on the question whether or not there was a proper nomination before us, whether or not the man who was nominated was fitted, and whether or not we thought his nomination should be confirmed by the Senate.

I do not want the RECORD to show in any manner, shape, or form that the Senator from Maryland or the other members of the Armed Services Committee are hostile or have sat in judgment on what Admiral Denfeld may or may not have done in any manner, shape, or form.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I think the Senator from Wisconsin has raised today a very serious question on the floor of the United States Senate. When the matter was pending before the Committee on Armed Services, as shown by what the Senator has read from the official transcript of the hearings, I raised certain issues with Secretary Matthews, so that the Armed Services Committee of the Senate of the United States might be adequately and properly informed. I do not quite agree with the able chairman of the committee that the Senate had no concern in this matter, because I think it relates to the appointment which has been made, and particularly because of the reference to the question as to whether there was a vacancy. In proceeding along the line of questions, I am frank to say I was stumped by the statement the Secretary made, because it was the first knowledge the junior Senator from California had that the point was being made that there was no person occupying the position. I had assumed, since the President had appointed Admiral Denfeld and his nomination had been sent to the Senate and had been regularly confirmed, that Admiral Denfeld was occupying the office for the first time.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, before the Senator from Maryland leaves, I should like to interrupt the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I am glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. McCARTHY. While the distinguished Senator is here, I may say I think it is a great mistake to call a witness before any committee without his first being sworn. Only last week the grand jury indicted a man for testifying falsely before our committee on a much less important matter, a matter which certainly did not affect the security of the United States. That man will be tried, and, if convicted, will, of course, serve time.

Incidentally, I cannot understand the testimony given by Secretary Matthews. I tried to check his background. I found that in his home town of Omaha he is apparently considered a very honorable man, a very truthful individual. It is hard to understand how he could so unequivocally say to the Senator from California and to the entire committee that the document was never signed, even though he himself had signed it. It may be that the man is so incompetent that he did not know what he was signing, but I think, while the chairman of the committee is present, one of the things the Senate should have in mind is that, no matter how important or how unimportant a matter may be, and no matter how much confidence we may have in the truthfulness and integrity of a witness, under all circumstances I think the witness should first be sworn.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. If I may complete the statement I started to make——

Mr. McCARTHY. Let the Senator from California complete his statement. After that, I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. As a result, when I asked this question as to how it came about that Admiral Denfeld had been removed, we were confronted, at least for the first time to my knowledge, with the fact that a commission had not been issued to him, despite the fact that the Senate had confirmed his nomination. A very plausible case was made, particularly in view of the legal background raised by the Senator from Maryland that the President had the right to withhold the commission prior to the time it was actually delivered to the person who was to receive the appointment. The documentary evidence which the Senator from Wisconsin has presented today is an entirely contrary bit of evidence to that testified by the Secretary of the Navy, and I certainly believe, as one member of the Armed Services Committee, that our committee is entitled to a full explanation from the Secretary as to how it has happened that he testified one way before the committee, in the face of this facsimile or photostat which has been presented today.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. I merely want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that my views are somewhat similar to those of the Senator from California. But I want to say to him that the reason I did not ask, and I think the reason why many of my colleagues did not ask for the swearing of the witness, was that we thought there was no question that the Secretary of the Navy was such a responsible official that he would tell the truth. I am shocked, absolutely shocked, to think the Senator is able today to produce a photostat of a commission issued to Admiral Denfeld, which I, with my own ears, heard Secretary Matthews testify before the Armed Services Committee had never been issued. It certainly is something the Armed Services Committee should look into and look into immediately. Secretary Matthews should be summoned at once to appear before the committee to explain the differences between his testimony before the committee and the facts which the Senator from Wisconsin has presented on the floor of the Senate today.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the photostatic copy has not yet been offered in its entirety in the RECORD. Does the Senator care to do that at this time?

Mr. McCARTHY. I shall be glad to read the entire photostat into the RECORD. It is as follows:

To All Who Shall See These Presents, Greeting:

Know ye that, reposing special trust and confidence in the patriotism, fidelity, and abilities of Admiral Louis E. Denfeld, I do, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint him Chief of Naval Operations in the Department of the Navy, with the rank of admiral, from the 15th day of December 1947, for a term of 2 years from the 15th day of December 1949.

Given under my hand, in the District of Columbia, this 14th day of September A. D. 1949, and in the one hundred seventy-fourth year of the independence of the United States.

HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of the United States.
FRANCIS P. MATTHEWS,
Secretary of the Navy.

The Senate will note that the rank of Admiral is to date from the 15th day of December 1947, while the commission as Chief of Naval Operations, for a term of 2 years, is to date from the 15th day of December 1949. I mention that, for otherwise the two dates might be confusing.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Do I correctly understand the commission as rank of Admiral was retroactive?

Mr. McCARTHY. That is not unusual, I may say.

Mr. AIKEN. It is not?

Mr. McCARTHY. No, it is not unusual to have a rank made retroactive.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator. May I ask the purpose of making it retroactive?

Mr. McCARTHY. I should know, but frankly I do not.

Mr. AIKEN. Is it because it would give the appointee a little better rating on retirement? If not, what is the reason?

Mr. McCARTHY. I frankly do not know. I may say I recently obtained my commission as a major in the Marine Corps. It was retroactive.

Mr. AIKEN. It was retroactive, and made as of a time away back somewhere, was it?

Mr. McCARTHY. No. It was retroactive for a period of about 1 month.

Mr. AIKEN. I should say that was different.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. For the benefit of Senators who came in late, I should like to reread this testimony. I am utterly shocked by what took place before the committee, in view of what the Senator from Wisconsin has produced here today. I read from page 94 of volume 2 of the hearings before the Committee on Armed Services, relative to the nomination of Admiral F. E. Sherman to be Chief of Naval Operations. Secretary Matthews was before the committee. I may say it took a little maneuvering in order to get the Secretary before the committee, but I shall not go into that at the present time. The question was:

Senator KNOWLAND. How long is the term of chief of naval operations?

Secretary MATTHEWS. The term for which Admiral Denfeld was appointed the first time was 2 years.

Senator KNOWLAND. Was the appointment on August 15, 1949, presumably for a 2-year term?

Secretary MATTHEWS. A second term of 2 years; yes, sir.

Senator KNOWLAND. A second term of 2 years. Could you inform the committee as to how it happened that there is a vacancy in the office?

Parenthetically I may say at that point, I raised the question as to how there happened to be a vacancy in the office, because the matter of confirmation is, under the Constitution, peculiarly a Senate function. The House has no function to perform in the confirmation of appointees. I felt it was a very pertinent question. I continue:

Secretary MATTHEWS. Well, at the present time the vacancy occurs by the fact that Admiral Denfeld's first term has expired and he never has been appointed for a second term. His name was suggested, he was confirmed, but the commission was never issued to him.

That is a categorical statement. It is one on which I, as a member of the Armed Services Committee, I believe, have a right to rely, as I believe the other members of the committee have a right to rely, when a responsible official of the Government of the United States, the Secretary of the Navy, is appearing before a committee of the Senate. I think it is a matter of such importance that the chairman of the committee should summon the committee into session again immediately, so we may have an opportunity of again having Secretary Matthews before us to explain the discrepancy which now appears.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator very much. The Senator referred to "a responsible official." I think until the matter is cleared up, we cannot very well assume that the man is a responsible official. I think we may say, "a supposedly responsible official."

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CAIN. Did I correctly understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say that he personally had obtained this photostat from Admiral Denfeld?

Mr. McCARTHY. The original is in Admiral Denfeld's possession. The photostat was made from the original, which has been delivered, and which is now in the possession of Admiral Denfeld.

Mr. CAIN. If I may inquire further, has the Senator from Wisconsin seen the original of which this is a photostat, or has the Senator been told personally by Admiral Denfeld that the original is in his possession?

Mr. McCARTHY. I have not seen the original, nor have I asked Admiral Denfeld the specific question as to whether he has it in his possession.

I was informed that he had it in his possession. I asked him to supply photostatic copies of it, and I received four photostatic copies of the document. I never specifically said, "Admiral do you have that in your possession?"

Mr. CAIN. I thank the Senator. May I ask the Senator to read to the Senate again from the case which seems to establish the fact that the President does not have the authority to remove an executive officer who has been appointed for a stated period to a position as the result of his nomination having been confirmed by the Senate of the United States?

Mr. McCARTHY. I shall be glad to. First, however, let me say that I am convinced that even if the President does not have the power to remove Admiral Denfeld, he could nevertheless have accomplished his removal. For if the President had said, "I no longer want you in my official family; you cannot get along with Matthews; you do not subscribe to the policies and the thinking of this great naval expert, Matthews," I am sure Denfeld would have had no alternative but to resign.

The case to which I had reference is the Humphreys case involving a Mr. Humphreys who had been removed by President Roosevelt from the Federal Trade Commission. After his death the executor of the estate sued the Government for pay from the time Humphreys was removed up to the expiration date of his term of office. The Supreme Court held that the estate was entitled to the money, stating that there was a definite, fixed term of office, and that a man could not be removed from office merely because he held different views and different policies from those held by the President. In other words, it was held that such a term of office is not at the whim or caprice of even the appointing power.

Mr. CAIN. The reason the junior Senator from Washington raised that question is that during the hearing at which Admiral Sherman was recommended for confirmation by the Armed Services Committee, the Secretary of the Navy established what he claimed to be a fact, that the President of the United States did have a perfect right to nominate Admiral Sherman for the office of Chief of Naval Operations because there was a vacancy in that office. If I have understood clearly, as I think I have, the position taken by the junior Senator from Wisconsin, it is that there has been no vacancy in the office of the Chief of Naval Operations, for the reason that the signed certificate to which the Senator from Wisconsin has referred was given officially by either the President or the Secretary of the Navy to Admiral Denfeld.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator understands, of course, that I do not know what action the President or the Secretary may have taken. I have not talked to either of them. In view of the fact that Matthews either did not know or else misrepresented the facts regarding the existence of this document, it is entirely possible that the President did take some steps which might have effectively removed Admiral Denfeld about which Matthews did not know. That I do not know.

Mr. CAIN. Permit me to associate myself with the views expressed by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], and to join in the hope that the Armed Services Committee will find it convenient at an early date to call Secretary Matthews before the committee in an attempt to secure an understanding on this important national problem.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. When this matter came before the Armed Services Committee, prior to the opening of this session, some members of the Armed Services Committee were very greatly disturbed about this problem, because they had high respect for Admiral Denfeld's ability and his Americanism, and they had confidence in him as Chief of Naval Operations.

When the President submitted Denfeld's name last fall for the second 2-year term, the nomination came before the Armed Services Committee and, in turn, before the Senate. The President appointed him, the Armed Services Committee recommended the confirmation of his nomination, it was confirmed by the Senate, and we thought it was a closed chapter. Certainly I, for one, was shocked when I read and heard that the first thing Admiral Denfeld knew about his removal was when an aide came into his office and stated that he had read on a news ticker outside the statement that the admiral had been removed. We all felt that he had been properly appointed and commissioned. That raised a question of reasonable doubt as to whether a vacancy occurred in the office of the Chief of Naval Operations. I had some rather concerted legal opinion as to whether a vacancy did exist. I raised the question in the Armed Services Committee. It was then pointed out to us that the commission had never been issued. Then the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] brought forth a Supreme Court ruling which he interpreted to hold that the President was within his rights in not issuing a commission. The action of the committee came about, at least in part, as a result of the statements by Secretary Matthews, and the Supreme Court ruling interpreted and read by the chairman of the committee. I think all the members of the committee had a very high opinion of Admiral Sherman as a man.

But when the Senator from Wisconsin produced on the floor of the Senate a photostatic copy of a commission which was issued to Admiral Denfeld, when the Secretary of the Navy, testifying before the Armed Services Committee, stated that no such commission had ever been issued, it presents a very serious matter. I think the Senator could well ask the chairman of the committee, "Was the witness sworn?"

Frankly, as a member of the committee, I never thought we had to resort to swearing members of the Cabinet or sub-Cabinet officers. I did not think we had reached that point. But from now on I think my attitude certainly will change. I think it is a shocking thing, and I agree with the sentiments expressed by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] that the committee should immediately call Secretary Matthews before it for an explanation of why he testified one way on one day when he had previously testified to the contrary.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator.

I may say that I heartily disagree with one of the statements made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] involving his assumption that the task of trying to penetrate the Pentagon "brass curtain" in order to find out what has been going on there is not the task of the Senate, but for some reason is the task of the House of Representatives. I do not follow that reasoning at all. The Pentagon has been guilty of very shameful and shoddy treatment of Admiral Denfeld. I do not mean his removal, but I refer to the method of his removal. What was the reason for this? Here was a man with an outstanding record, whose nomination had been confirmed unanimously by the Senate, a man in whose integrity and ability the President and Matthews just a few months ago said they reposed special trust and confidence. Yet that man learned from an aide that he had been fired. The aide came into his office and said, "I have just heard over the news tape that you have lost your job."

That, in my opinion, was deliberately done to inform every other officer in the military, whether the Army, the Navy, the Air Corps, or Marine Corps, that they were no longer free to tell the Congress honestly and truthfully what they think may be right or wrong with our Defense Establishment. If the Pentagon is allowed to get away with that type of high-handedness—which apparently is condoned by the Secretary of Defense and obviously is condoned by the President, or it would not go on—if they are allowed to get away with it, then never again can we intelligently legislate insofar as our Defense Establishment is concerned, for we shall be legislating blindfolded.

For that reason I very heartily disagree with the Senator from Maryland when he says that the Senate should not go into the matter, but that for some reason the House should go into it. I think it is a task which the Senate also should perform.

Mr. President, who is this man Matthews who says that anyone who disagrees with him on how to run the Navy will be transferred to the Siberia of an inferior post?

Certainly he must be loyal to the Navy. Certainly he must be an authority on Navy affairs. So at least I thought when I heard his statement that anyone who disagreed with him as to how the Navy should be run, anyone who was disloyal to his concept of naval strategy, would be relegated to the limbo of obscurity.

However, Mr. President, upon checking we find that this man Matthews is a fine family man and apparently a likeable lawyer from Omaha. Aside from practicing law and having a short tour of duty in the USO, he has no background which could even remotely entitle him to the claim of being a great naval strategist. In fact, Mr. President, when he was first appointed by President Truman, he told newsmen in Omaha that he had never sailed in anything larger than a rowboat.

This, Mr. President, is the same Mr. Matthews who says that Admiral Denfeld's head must fall and that the heads of two other great naval heroes—Admiral Bogan and Captain Crommelin—must fall because they had the audacity to differ with him on the question of what was good for the defense of the Nation.

Mr. President, I should again like to refer to the hearings which were held before the Senate Armed Services Committee last week. The Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], one of our most objective, sincere, and intelligent Senators, was apparently disturbed about Matthews' concept of loyalty. Under questioning by the Senator from California, this is what Matthews said—and I am again quoting from the record of the hearings at page 111, and I call the attention of the Senate to this:

Secretary MATTHEWS. Senator, I am just as convinced as you are that the congressional committees should have that right.

He was referring to the right to get the true facts. I ask Senators to listen to the next two sentences, and see if they can reconcile them.

The individual—

Meaning the military or naval officer who testified—

The individual should have not only the right but the duty to testify, to be absolutely sure that he will not suffer any reprisal by doing so.

So far, that sounds fairly good. But this is what he next said:

But I also think that when a member of the Military Establishment does that—

That is, testify truthfully and honestly—that he must be prepared to, in a sense, take the consequences.

Mr. President, that was the Secretary of the Navy speaking, assuring the Congress that any military man should be prepared to tell the truth, but that if he does so, he must be ready to take the consequences.

The Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] then asked this question, which appears on page 113:

Well, then, they are all on notice here that if they do disagree, even if I or any other member of the committee asks a question, they are apt to be removed and sent, perhaps, to a less desirable or more distant post?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Whether you ask the question or not, that would be the case.

Later, as appears on page 113, Matthews said this:

It is not a matter, in my judgment, as to where he expresses that opinion.

Again referring to an officer in the service—

The important thing is that he entertains that conviction in opposition to his superior officer.

In other words, even if nothing is said, if any man in the Navy, the Air Force, the Army, or the Marine Corps, entertains—using Matthews' own language—a conviction in opposition to that of this great naval strategist, Matthews, then he should go. How Matthews hopes to enforce this thought-control I frankly do not know.

Mr. President, this is the most dangerous, the most illogical, the most hairbrain concept of the duties of an officer sworn to defend his Nation that I have ever heard.

I wonder why the President of the United States, the commander in chief of our armed forces, appoints such a man to such a critically important job in our defense set-up. Certainly not because of his ability. I realize, of course, that Matthews was a good and loyal supporter of Truman when his campaign looked hopeless. But why must he pay him off at the expense of our national security?

Mr. President, there are many criticisms which a great number of us make about the late President Roosevelt. Fortunately, however, he did not play politics with national security. He did a tremendous job of building up a strong, well-balanced Military Establishment. Instead of having the military operate behind a brass curtain of secrecy, he encouraged free discussion and criticism between the branches of the service, with the aim of improving our defense machinery.

History, Mr. President, will remember Franklin Roosevelt as a great builder of a strong, well-balanced defense, while Truman will go down in history as the man who destroyed, and at an unpredictable cost, the defense of the Nation.

The Secretary of the Navy defines as disloyalty any disagreement with him as to what is best for the defense of this Nation. Luckily, some of our oustanding naval officers have refused to subscribe to that theory. Luckily, they have refused to be cowed by his threat of reprisals if they honestly advocate what they think is best for this Nation.

Those men are being used as an example, apparently with a hope that men with less backbone will be discouraged from doing likewise. For example, Navy Capt. John Crommelin—with a war record which most of us who served with him in the Pacific envy—felt that his duty to the Nation was infinitely more important than his own future.

If Matthews himself had known even 1 hour of war, he perhaps would have understood that threats of demotion could no more deter Captain Crommelin than could the Japs, who burned off his uniform, stopped him from rescuing his wounded men lying below deck in sick bay.

But Matthews says Crommelin's head must fall because Crommelin puts loyalty to his Government above loyalty to Matthews—who, Mr. President, as far as I know, certainly has done nothing to earn loyalty from any member of the Navy.

Nor, Mr. President, is this the only example of the antagonism toward Navy officers by the man who should be their champion?

Not long ago the name of Capt. Arleigh Burke was recommended by the Navy Selection Board for promotion to rear admiral. Recognizing the remarkable qualities of this brave officer the Navy Selection Board voted unanimously to include him among the 22 who were to be promoted to rear admiral. The law states—and incidentally, Matthews is a lawyer, and I understand one with rather a good reputation—the law states that only the President may remove a name from or add one to that list. In other words, the President only has the power to do that. Yet the Secretary of the Navy asked the Navy Selection Board to remove the name of Capt. Arleigh Burke, because he disliked his views.

We were told by the press that when the President was asked at Key West whether any name had been removed from the list, he stated that he had seen only one list, and that that list did not contain the name of Arleigh Burke. He stated definitely to the press that Captain Burke's name had not been removed from the list by him. Yet the Secretary of the Navy had undertaken to do what the law does not empower him to do, what the law in effect forbids his doing. Subsequently, exercising good sense, the President, listening to the plea of Admiral Sherman, restored the name of Capt. Arleigh Burke to the list for promotion to rear admiral, and I cannot commend too heartily both the President and Admiral Sherman for this sensible step. Otherwise, every man in the armed services would have felt that promotions no longer were to be achieved by merit, but only by conformity to the views of others, and by goose-stepping mentalities.

If, as we now find, the commission for Admiral Denfeld, which the Secretary of the Navy says was not signed, actually has been issued, does it not cast doubt upon the legality of the new nomination which we are asked to consider today? Has Admiral Denfeld been lawfully removed from office? On what basis has he been removed, and is there a vacancy for which Admiral Sherman is eligible?

This is a serious question, Mr. President. It is a question that touches the whole future of our Military Establishment. Even if we are to concede that the President of the United States has the power of removal—though I seriously doubt it, because of the limitations placed upon him by the unification law passed last August—would it not have been the better part of wisdom to have asked for the resignation of the Chief of Naval Operations without subjecting him to public humiliation and an accusation of disloyalty? Is this the reward which a naval officer may expect for the free expression of his views?

I do not doubt for a moment, knowing Admiral Denfeld's fine personality, that if the President of the United States had told him that he desired to appoint another Chief of Naval Operations, he gladly would have submitted his resignation, and there would have been no doubt today of the legality of the step which we are asked to take.

But there must have been some other purpose, Mr. President, in making a public accusation and making a public announcement of the removal of Admiral Denfeld. It must have been—and this is what I think should disturb not only the Members of the Senate, but every other American—it must have been in order to impress members of our armed services with the fact that they must conform to the views of their civilian superiors in everything, and that they must not expect to talk frankly and honestly to those civilian superiors.

It must have been, Mr. President, intended to convey explicitly the impression that the Secretary of the Navy is master, and that everybody in the Navy is his servant. Such autocracy is deplorable. Such autocracy is not in keeping with the traditions of the American system of government.

We talk about democracy inside the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force. We ask that segregation be abolished, and we ask also that the members of our armed services shall be indoctrinated with the great aims and purposes of our country in its world policies. But, in so doing, are we making a convincing impression when we proclaim and profess to be interested in the freedom of the individual, and then use the iron hand of suppression to build a wall between the members of our armed services and their true civilian superiors, the Congress and the people of the United States?

This wall—this Johnson-inspired and Truman-condoned brass curtain of secrecy—can lead to serious consequences for our Military Establishment.

It can mean that the Congress of the United States will never again have the necessary information upon which to legislate independently on the needs of the armed services.

It can lead to interservice rivalries. It can increase rather than diminish the friction which we all have hoped to avoid through the passage of the unification law. It can lead to a widespread demoralization, not only inside but outside the armed services, so that the people will begin to question whether the military policies we are adopting are, after all, the most effective. There can be no harmony where there is injustice.

But the remedy does not lie in opposing the nomination of Admiral Forrest Sherman. As I stated before, I think he is an outstanding officer. However, I doubt very much that he will measure up—or measure down, rather—to the qualifications which Matthews demands in a Chief of Naval Operations. I am firmly convinced that Sherman, after his outstanding record, will not develop the type of goose-stepping mentality and be the type of yes-man that apparently Matthews expects. The remedy lies rather in the writing of specfic safeguards into the law so that the power of removal will be limited to those proper and desirable causes which may require a change in personnel. At no time should it be possible for a man to be punished for his views. This is not the way to serve Congress or the country.

Congress at all times must have access to the views of persons in the executive branch of the Government. The Constitution says that the Congress and the executive establishment are coordinate.

The Constitution, moreover, specifies that Congress, and Congress alone, shall make the "rules for the governing of the land and naval forces."

It is an essential part of this rule-making that Congress shall keep open the avenues of communication between the executive and legislative establishments. It is important that we shall be able to get accurate information, unbiased information, truthful information, and information given us without fear of any reprisals.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that, as one member of the Armed Services Committee, I draw a distinction between testimony given to the properly constituted committees of the Congress of the United States, and such activities as naval or Army or Air Force officers might wish to carry on on the outside. If a person writes a magazine article or a press statement, or makes a speech at a public meeting, I think he must be prepared to accept the responsibility for what he says, because there exists in the armed services, of course, the matter of discipline, which does not exist in the civilian services, certainly not to the same extent. But I think the question of whether a witness would have the right, and in fact I think the duty, to respond to questions from a congressional committee, is a very basic one, and unless there is that right, I know of no way that the properly constituted committees of the Congress can discharge their constitutional obligation in carrying on their responsibilities.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator from California. I want to call his attention to the fact—I am sure he is aware of it, but I am not sure it is in the RECORD now—I call his attention to the fact that Secretary Matthews has a directly opposite view from that of the Senator from California. As the Senator said, any member of the military should be able to come to the Capitol and freely discuss matters with the properly constituted committees of the Senate and the House. The Senator says there may be a difference between doing that and writing newspaper articles and making speeches. But this is what Secretary Matthews said before the committee:

> It is not a matter, in my judgment, as to where he expresses the opinion. The important thing is that he entertains that conviction in opposition to his superior officer.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I do not have all the facts which the Senator from Wisconsin has presented, and which have led him to his conclusion in this particular case. But I wonder if I understood the Senator correctly to say that Congress probably should pass a law which would limit the right of the Commander in Chief or the civilian secretaries of any of the Armed Forces, not to remove a man from the military, but to change a man from one tour of duty to another. Is that correct?

Mr. McCARTHY. It may not be necessary to pass any additional laws. We already have on the books a law which provides a definite term for the Chief of Naval Operations.

Mr. MAGNUSON. What is that term?

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me read from the law:

> There shall be a Chief of Naval Operations who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of not more than 4 years.

That has apparently been established for 2 years. I believe the reason for that provision is obvious. It is to make sure that the Chief of Naval Operations can feel some security, that he can come before congressional committees and discuss freely and without threat of removal, the problems of the military organization. That, in my opinion, is the reason why we have set a specific term of office.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I can understand the reason.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me finish. That is the reasoning of the Supreme Court in the Humphreys case, in which the Court said that where the appointment is for a specific term there cannot be removal merely because the appointee disagrees in some respects with the man who appointed him.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I can understand the desirability of having as long a term as possible for any military policy maker. But I cannot understand the complete desirability of freezing men in military posts. Let us leave Secretary Matthews out of the discussion for the moment. It seems to me undesirable that an individual should be frozen in his post of command, either military or naval.

Mr. McCARTHY. We are not talking about that, I will say to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. MAGNUSON. It seems to me that would be undesirable. The only reason the founding fathers decided we should have civilian heads of the military is to have that flexibility. There may be the legal exception in the case of the Chief of Naval Operations, but I still believe it is undesirable.

I am somewhat familiar with the Humphreys case. Mr. Humphreys happened to come from my town. He had been a distinguished Member of Congress. His appointment was for a stated term to an independent agency, an agency which was independent of the Executive, except only so far as the appointing power was concerned.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me say this, so the Senator can have no misconception as to my position. Obviously we cannot freeze every man in the military in a particular command. I have no desire to defeat the appointment of Admiral Sherman. I think he will make an outstanding man for the position. I am not attempting to discuss the question of whether Sherman or Denfeld would make the better Chief of Naval Operations. I think there is no doubt whatsoever that if the President says to Denfeld, "I wish you would resign," that Denfeld will give the President his resignation. The thing which disturbs me a great deal, I will say to the Senator, is the very, very unusual procedure used in the removal of Denfeld. He was appointed and came before the Senate committee. He was sworn, sworn to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—at least, I assume he was sworn.

In addition to that, we gave him a statutory duty when we set up this job. We gave him a statutory duty to discuss his problems freely with the Congress. He did that, and because of that he was not only removed, but removed in an extremely shoddy manner. The first he heard about his removal was when some aide walked into his office and said, "Admiral, you have been fired."

The question today is not whether he should be Chief of Naval Operations, but whether we now have in the Pentagon a situation in which no officer will dare to come before Committees of Congress and testify to facts, because he knows that his head will fall the next day.

I might say I have many friends in the Pentagon, Army officers, Navy officers, Air Corps and Marine officers, men with whom I have served. I have discussed these problems with them. When they have given me information that I think should be given to the Senate I have invariably asked, "Well, will you come before the committee and testify?" The answers have been couched in different words, but it all sums up to the same thing, and that is "I would only risk testifying if I were ready to resign my commission tomorrow." That I believe is the important issue, not only before the Congress, but before the entire Nation. The Denfeld dismissal happens to be the culmination, I believe, of a long series of events which I intend to discuss briefly.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I agree with the Senator concerning the necessity of allowing military men to give such military information as they can before the Congress, or even political information. I was for a long time a member of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House. While such a member I helped to establish a policy under which such officers could have more leeway in giving their political views.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not speaking of political views.

Mr. MAGNUSON. It is all right if they wish to discuss political views. I am not discussing the Denfeld or the Sherman incidents. I think the question goes much deeper than that. I hope the Congress will not in any way freeze the hands of the Commander in Chief or the civilian heads of our Military Establishment, as they are provided to be under the Constitution, not necessarily in their right to remove a man, but in their right to change the tours of duty.

Mr. McCARTHY. Does the Senator think their hands are frozen?

Mr. MAGNUSON. It may be that Secretary Matthews in the present case, or someone else in another case used bad judgment, or did not act in the right manner. But in my opinion it would be most undesirable to freeze any man in the post of Chief of Naval Operations for 4 years. Suppose we were at war and the Chief of Naval Operations was frozen in his post for 4 years. Suppose the Commander in Chief decided that Chief of Naval Operations was not operating the war as he, the Commander in Chief, thought he should, whether the Commander in Chief was right or wrong in his judgment. If the Senate were to enter into the situation the war might be over before it could conclude its debate on the subject.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the Senator will now come back to the question before us——

Mr. MAGNUSON. The real reason for providing civilian heads of our military departments was to give them the right to change the tours of duty of officers. A vast body of law has evolved in the past years establishing the rights of those who are in the military with respect to promotions, and so forth.

Mr. McCARTHY. I will say to the Senator that we are discussing different things. To get back to the subject I am discussing, I will say I am not concerned about mistakes Secretary Matthews may have made. We know that when Mr. Sullivan was Secretary of the Navy he said, "I am going to fight for a balanced defense. To have a well-balanced defense we must have a strong Navy." When he refused to be a "yes" man he was forced out. Now, if we must have "yes" men, under one man at the top who is a dictator, that means we are going to have only second and third and fourth team men, because small men can always be found, men who will "yes" their superior just to maintain the position of power which they have. If Secretary Matthews is removed, I am sure the President can find another "yes" man.

It appears that Mr. Matthews is not a man who has any conceivable knowledge of the Navy or any conceivable interest in it. I wonder whether the Senator knows the background of Mr. Matthews. I tried to check into it. I cannot understand what he is doing in that position.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Of course, the Senator is——

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I refuse to yield until I have finished this statement.

Mr. Matthews is apparently a well-thought-of lawyer from Omaha, Nebr. He has never been near the water. He himself said—to quote his own statement—that the greatest naval experience he ever had was in a rowboat. He came to the post of Secretary of the Navy, but apparently he has no loyalty either to the Navy or to the President. Apparently he did not know what he was doing. I do not think he was actually lying when he told the committee that Admiral Denfeld's commission did not exist, when he said that Admiral Denfeld never got the commission, even though Mr. Matthews himself had signed it a short time before. The reason I say that I do not think he was lying is that the use of the word "lie" presupposes that the person concerned knew what he was talking about. However, I do not think Mr. Matthews even knew that he had signed the document appointing Admiral Denfeld to the most important position in our Naval Establishment. I think Mr. Matthews did not know that a plan was being put into execution behind a brass curtain of secrecy.

Of course, any man who tries to penetrate that brass curtain of secrecy immediately finds himself in great difficulties and his head falls. Not only do I think such a situation is most unfair to the officers of our Military Establishment but I think that situation is very dangerous to the Nation.

In this connection, let us consider the secrecy situation at the Pentagon. Presently General Bradley is Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. I think General Bradley is one of our most outstanding men, and would do a good job in any position. I would not be so disturbed by this brass curtain of secrecy if we could know that we would always have a man such as General Bradley in his post. But we cannot begin such a practice of secrecy and rely upon always having an outstanding man in that job.

Furthermore, General Bradley, of course, may differ some day with some politician whom the President may appoint as head of the Defense Establishment and Bradley's head may then also fall. Then the brass curtain which is now being created would be infinitely more dangerous.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. When the Senator refers to penetrating the brass curtain, I assume he means penetrating it from the outside, in; does he not? I say that because, according to the information which has come to us from time to time, it occurs to me that there has been considerable difficulty in penetrating it from the inside, out.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think both. The five naval officers who testified before the committee, decided they would break through the brass curtain of secrecy and would tell the truth. But their heads are falling; and every other man who has been working behind that brass curtain is being informed today that, "If you do the same as Denfeld did"—in other words, if you honestly tell the Congress the truth—"and if you do not abide by the secrecy rules we have adopted, you will no longer be in this Establishment."

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, to permit me to ask a question of my colleague?

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield for that purpose, without losing the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CAIN. I am simply seeking information. The problem before us is admittedly very confusing.

I wonder whether my colleague, the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON], representing, as he does, the administration, judging from the seat he now occupies, knows whether Admiral Denfeld ever received a commission from the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy for a second term as Chief of Naval Operations, to begin some time in December of 1949?

Mr. MAGNUSON. No; I answer my colleague by saying that I know nothing of the facts in this case, and I know nothing as to whether the conclusions of the Senator from Wisconsin in respect to what has happened are correct. I am merely talking about what in my opinion is the undesirability of freezing any man in a military post. Of course, there might be a time when there would be a bad Chief of Naval Operations or a bad Chief of Staff. I do not say Admiral Denfeld is good or is bad; I merely refer to the undesirability of freezing any man in a military post. Our forefathers recognized that it would be unwise. I think it would be very unwise for the security of our Nation.

The Senator from Wisconsin is complaining about the method used in Admiral Denfeld's case. I do not have any idea about that; I know none of the facts.

Mr. CAIN. Permit me to say that before my colleague came on the floor, the Senator from Wisconsin maintained, through offering for the RECORD a photostat of the commission and showing it to the Senate that Admiral Denfeld had received a signed commission as Chief of Naval Operations.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. CAIN. The fundamental question in the minds of all of us is that if Admiral Denfeld received that commission, how is it humanly possible to understand the action of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Matthews, when seeking the confirmation by the Senate of the nomination of Admiral Sherman, denying the existence of such a commission? Certainly my colleague and I are in agreement that out of fairness to the administration and to the admirals involved, and to the Secretary of the Navy, we should waste no time at all in bringing the Secretary of the Navy back before the Armed Services Committee and giving him an opportunity to reconcile these outstanding differences, and to determine wherein lies the truth. Are we in agreement on that?

Mr. MAGNUSON. I have no disagreement on that.

Leaving all personalities aside, and forgetting about the incident, this matter brings up the very serious question, What is the power of the Commander in Chief or of a civilian secretary of a military establishment, working either separately or jointly, under the orders of the Commander in Chief, to remove anyone at any time from a military post.

Mr. CAIN. But I think there is one question which has priority over that, namely, whether a member of the President's Cabinet has spoken the truth before a standing committee of the United States Senate.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I agree that the members of the President's Cabinet should always speak the truth.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. Is it not a fact that the unification law calls for the Chief of Naval Operations to be appointed for a term of not exceeding 4 years?

Mr. McCARTHY. That is correct; he has a specific term.

Mr. CAPEHART. In other words, if there is any weakness, as the Senator would like to make us believe there is, it lies at the feet of Congress, because the law provides that the Chief of Naval Operations shall be appointed for a specific period of time.

Mr. MAGNUSON. But what is the power of removal?

Mr. McCARTHY. I shall answer that question. I do not think there can be any question about it. Under the well-established law, a man who is appointed for a specified term can be removed for cause—in other words, if he is incompetent or is not doing a good job.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Yes.

Mr. McCARTHY. The senior Senator from Washington and I know that, as a practical matter, a Secretary of the Navy appointed by the President is appointed at the President's pleasure. If the Chief of Naval Operations cannot get along with the Secretary of the Navy, then it is incumbent for the President to ask for the resignation of his Secretary of the Navy; or if the President thinks the Chief of Naval Operations is incompetent, it is incumbent upon the President to take steps to remove him. Those steps are not difficult. The Senator and I know that all the President has to do is call up or write Admiral Denfeld and say to him, "I wish you would resign." So we do not run into a serious problem there.

But in considering the appointment of a Chief of Naval Operations for a specified term, let us now consider the possibility that he may be asked to resign or may be told that he may be removed, not because of incompetence, but because, as Matthews said, because he maintains convictions in opposition to his superior officer. The Senator and I know that normally the Secretary of the Navy does not consider himself to be a great naval strategist. Normally the Secretary of the Navy is a liaison man between the Navy and the White House. Normally he is a man who has a deep interest in the Navy and will go to bat and fight for the rights and interests of the Navy.

But now for the first time in the history of the Navy, so far as I know, we have a Secretary of the Navy, who says, "I am the final word in naval strategy." He is a lawyer who, according to my knowledge, has had nothing to do with the Navy, except for a tour of duty in the USO, and his only experience with naval matters or maritime matters has been to go on the water in a rowboat. That constitutes his entire experience on the water, so he himself states. Now we learn that he says that if the officers of the Navy entertain convictions which are in opposition to his own, then those men must go.

Of course, it is obvious that officers of the Navy entertain convictions opposite to those of Secretary Matthews. When a man is appointed to such a post as the one Mr. Matthews holds, not because of his ability, but because he supported the right man politically, and then insists upon maintaining his idea of goose-step loyalty, then it is indeed a sad day for our country.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Again, I say I do not know whether Secretary Matthews made an error in his statement, or whether his interpretation of what he said is the same as that presented here by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Senator from Wisconsin and I have our own views of the military.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is correct.

Mr. MAGNUSON. If we had expressed all our views, we might have been in the brig once or twice on certain occasions. But I am not talking about that. I am trying to emphasize the seriousness of the conduct of the Military Establishment. I do not know anything about Mr. Matthews. I do not know whether it was a purely political appointment or not. He was confirmed by the Senate. His record was gone into by the Committee on Armed Services. I believe his confirmation was unanimous. I do not know whether the President selected the wrong man. Perhaps it is time we had a Democrat as Secretary of the Navy; we have had Republicans in that office for so long. It might be helpful to have such a switch. But I say it is a serious matter as to what are the rights not only of the Commander in Chief but of the civilian Secretary, in terms of their relationships with their officers. I think the matter should be explored by the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I think there should be some clarification of the question about the issuance of the commission to Admiral Denfeld. The Senator will note on page 100 of the transcript of the testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee that Secretary Matthews apparently thought the commission had never been issued to Admiral Denfeld, and he also said that Admiral Denfeld had never held up his hand or been sworn in, that the commission had never been executed or accepted by Admiral Denfeld, and that he had not taken the oath of office. Secretary Matthews apparently was incorrect about the commission's not having been issued. But I understand the facts to be that Admiral Denfeld was never actually sworn in, that he never took the oath of office. In the colloquy appearing at page 100 of the transcript, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] said:

Well, the President changed his mind, is what it amounted to.

Secretary MATTHEWS. That is right, and on my recommendation.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Admiral Denfeld never held up his hand?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Never held up his hand; the commission was never issued to him; he was never sworn in.

Senator SALTONSTALL. And he changed his mind on your recommendation?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So, the first term had expired, and he was not reappointed—

Colloquy follows at that point. So I take it it is true that, regardless of the merits and the abilities of these men—and I think everybody agrees that Admiral Denfeld is a very capable officer—he had never actually taken the oath of office, and I believe that is necessary in order to begin a term. I think the Senator will agree with me.

Mr. McCARTHY. I frankly do not know what if any papers Admiral Denfeld had signed but, so there will be no question about this, will the Senator turn to page 125, where the following appears:

Senator SALTONSTALL. May I ask Mr. Matthews one question, which I hope is for the purpose of clearing the record with respect to what he has said.

You have stated, Mr. Secretary, that you took full responsibility for not recommending to the President to sign Admiral Denfeld's commission. * * *

Is that correct?

Mr. MATTHEWS. Yes; that is correct.

I may say to the Senator that I have made no thorough investigation of this. It is possible the President may have taken steps which have actually removed Admiral Denfeld; I do not know. All I know is that Secretary Matthews, who is a lawyer, appeared before the committee and said, "The reason there is a vacancy is because the commission was never signed, it was never issued." We now find the commission was signed; it was issued. Therefore, it is entirely possible that Matthews is also wrong as to what, if any, action the President took.

I frankly cannot conceive of Secretary of Defense Johnson and the President proceeding to take steps to have a second Chief of Naval Operations while one man was still in office. I am inclined to think the Armed Services Committee may find that the President took some action, about which Matthews does not know, which may have removed him; I do not know. That is one of the things I think the Senator from Maryland, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, intends to investigate.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I should like to say a word further.

Mr. McCARTHY. I wish to compliment the Senator from Maryland on the very frank, honest attitude he takes toward this matter, when he says that if the commission was issued, and there is a doubt in his mind as to whether we have a Chief of Naval Operations, the Armed Services Committee will go into the matter.

Mr. KEFAUVER and Mr. TYDINGS addressed the Chair.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me yield first to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The fact is that Admiral Denfeld's commission expired, I believe, on December 15, 1949, and that practically all of this had taken place, including the argument in the House Armed Services Committee, prior to that time. I do not think the oath of office would have been given to Admiral Denfeld prior to December 15, and, of course, at that time it was known that he was out, and that Admiral Sherman or someone else was going to be selected.

Mr. McCARTHY. Wait a minute, Senator—Admiral Denfeld had taken the oath of office 2 years before; this commission extended his term for an additional 2 years.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; but his first term expired December 15.

Mr. McCARTHY. I may say to the Senator, I am not going to argue with him as to whether the office was vacant or not. I do not know. All I know is that Matthews either deliberately lied or he is so incompetent that he did not realize he signed the commission appointing a Chief of Naval Operations. I am not going to argue with the Senator as to whether the office was vacant or not; I do not know, at the present. I do not know what action the President took. He may have signed any number of orders. I do not know what action Johnson took. All I say is that Matthews gave the Armed Services Committee the wrong picture, either deliberately or because he was incompetent; I do not know which. Beyond that, I do not intend to argue whether the office was vacant or not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is going to enforce the rule that the Senator can yield for a question only.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I ask the Senator whether Secretary Matthews made two statements, one, that the commission had not been issued——

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I am going to insist that this be a question. If I do not, I may lose the floor.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Second, that he had not taken the oath of office; and he was incorrect as to his first statement, but there is no evidence that he was incorrect as to his second statement; is that not true?

Mr. McCARTHY. All I know is that he either lied or was mistaken in one major fact. How often he made mistakes, how much of the remainder of his testimony is true or false, I do not know.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McCARTHY. I cannot evaluate the testimony and say, "Here, the man was lying; here, he was incompetent; here, his statements are contradictory," without more information.

Mr. KEFAUVER. If the Senator will yield for a question, I wonder whether the Senator does not think that in order to give the Senate the benefit of the explanations that Secretary Matthews made, the Senator should read the colloquy beginning on page 116, and ending in the middle of page 117, in which Secretary Matthews explained what he meant by his answers to the previous questions?

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, at this time I ask unanimous consent that the entire transcript of the hearing before the Committee on Armed Services, January 10 and 12, 1950, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the transcript was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NOMINATION OF ADMIRAL F. E. SHERMAN TO BE CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS

TUESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1950

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to call, at 10:05 a. m., in room 212, Senate Office Building, Senator MILLARD E. TYDINGS (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators TYDINGS (chairman), RUSSELL, BYRD, CHAPMAN, JOHNSON of Texas,

KEFAUVER, HUNT, BRIDGES, GURNEY, SALTONSTALL, MORSE, and KNOWLAND.

Also present: Admiral F. E. Sherman.

The CHAIRMAN. We have got a quorum now, I believe. The admiral is here. We will go into executive session to vote, but I thought perhaps some of the members of the committee might——

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, might I make a brief statement? I have a very high regard for Admiral Sherman. My remarks are not directed towards the admiral, but I do think that there is a question involved on witnesses being able to testify before a committee of Congress without fear of recrimination.

Calling your attention to the testimony on unification and strategy before the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives, Mr. VINSON in opening the hearings had this to say, among other things:

"I would like to say on behalf of the committee, although I believe this comment is probably unnecessary, that it is the intent of the committee that all testimony given shall be frankly and freely given and be given without reprisals in the Department of Defense against any individual presenting testimony during the course of these hearings.

"This committee will not permit nor tolerate any reprisal against any witness in these hearings, nor will we permit nor tolerate any shepherding of the testimony being presented. We want these witnesses to speak what is in their minds, to put their cards on the table, and to do so without hesitation or personal concern. We are going to the bottom of this unrest and concern in the Navy. And the committee expects full cooperation in this effort from the Department of Defense. When the testimony is all in, the committee will try to reach a decision as to what action is indicated in the interests of national defense.

"I have asked the Secretary of the Navy, Admiral Denfeld, Admiral Radford, and Admiral Bogan to be present this morning to offer such testimony to the committee as they wish to present, and the committee will afford other officers an opportunity to appear."

Now since that time Admiral Denfeld has been removed and Admiral Bogan is apparently on the way out of the service.

Now on page 4 of the same hearings the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Matthews, made a statement, and I will ask that his entire remarks be put into the record. I will not take the time of the committee to read them, but it was indicated that witnesses could testify without fear of recrimination, and I believe there is also a letter from Mr. Matthews in that regard.

(The statement referred to follows:)

"STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF THE NAVY FRANCIS P. MATTHEWS

"Secretary MATTHEWS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in response to your committee's invitation, which I received yesterday, I appear here today as a witness from the Navy.

"You have invited several other officials of the Navy to testify in this proceeding at this time, and it may be that you plan to call other Navy witnesses later. All of us in the Navy desire to cooperate with your committee in every possible way. To that end, let me assure the committee that any naval officer or enlisted man or any Navy civilian whom your committee wants to hear, or who desires to be heard by your committee, is completely free to testify. There has been no censorship. There will be none.

"In addressing ourselves to the agenda which your committee adopted some time ago, we in the Department of the Navy had considered the advisability of having four top naval officers take the lead in presenting the official views of our Department. That plan represented a desire to offer you an orderly statement of the views and conclusions of the Department of the Navy. It was distinctly understood by all, however, that your committee would call such additional witnesses from the Navy as you might desire, and that any other member of the naval personnel who might not be called by you or by us who wished to be heard would be at liberty to speak so far as the Navy is concerned.

"In that connection, my position is the same as that which former Secretary Forrestal outlined in his annual report to the President and the Congress when he said:

"'I have stated to the Congress my position on the expression of personal views by the Secretaries and chiefs of the departments in the National Military Establishment. I have told those officials that I want them to feel perfectly free to express their personal views when called upon to do so by the Congress. The public and the Congress are entitled to know the personal views of the Secretaries and the chiefs, but the public and the Congress are also entitled to know whenever there is a material distinction between such personal views and the official conclusion which the Military Establishment has arrived at after mature consideration.'"

Senator KNOWLAND. Now I do not know what the facts are in the case, but it seems to me that before finally acting on this nomination of a new Chief of Naval Operations, I would like an opportunity to question the Secretary of the Navy and perhaps others to see whether or not witnesses who appeared—though it was not before this committee, it was before a committee of the House of Representatives—had recriminations against them because of the testimony they gave at the legislative branch of the Congress.

I say it with the highest regard for the admiral, because I know he has a splendid record, but I think this is the time and the place, if witnesses are to have protection before congressional committees, the matter should be gone into.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair for a moment get the situation straightened out. Without taking issue about anything that Senator KNOWLAND has presented, the facts are that Admiral Denfeld has resigned. The facts are that the place is vacant. The facts are that Admiral Sherman has been nominated by the President, so the question before this committee is, Is Admiral Sherman fit to be the Chief of Staff of the Navy?

Now there is very properly the concern of the committee in the question which Senator KNOWLAND has raised, but it seems to me that that ought to be a separate transaction and that Admiral Sherman is not here as a part of that because the question here is—he has been nominated, the place is vacant—is he fit to be the Chief of Staff of the Navy?

Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Chairman, may I say just a word here? You said Admiral Denfeld resigned. Did he resign?

The CHAIRMAN. I understand so.

Senator BRIDGES. I understand that the first Admiral Denfeld knew of his removal from that office was when an aide came into the office and reported it on a ticker from somewhere outside. If so, I think that is a contemptible manner of removing a man who 2 months before was considered a party Chief of Naval Operations and who was considered competent.

Now I believe, just as Senator KNOWLAND said, that Admiral Sherman is an able, competent, alert man. I have high admiration for him, but I do not like the method that has been used here.

The CHAIRMAN. Nobody is taking issue with that, but what is before us here is if we are going into the manner in which Admiral Denfeld severed his connection with the Navy, that is a very proper subject for us to take up, if we care to, but what we are here concerned with is the place is vacant, and whether or not Admiral Sherman should fill it. That would not bar an inquiry into the matter along the lines suggested by Senator KNOWLAND, if the committee desired it.

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I would not frankly be prepared, as one member of the committee, insofar as I have influence on the committee, to act on this nomination today.

It may be that after I have had additional time to study additional testimony before the House, after I get some other information which I have requested from the Navy Department but have not yet received, I would feel differently about it, but I do think that as one member—and perhaps other members on this committee feel—this is a pertinent inquiry, and at the time the particular job is open, particularly since Admiral Denfeld had just been renominated for a 4-year term and had been before this committee for confirmation not too long ago, it is pertinent to perhaps some of us to address questions to the Secretary of the Navy in this regard, and I would frankly object to any action today on the nomination.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you have something you want to say, Senator GURNEY?

Senator GURNEY. Mr. Chairman, I know that this committee should go into the matter of testimony before committees of the House and Senate. When the chairman of the House committee made the opening statement just read by Senator KNOWLAND, that there would be no reprisals, frank and open discussion, I believe the committees of Congress have got to maintain the right to question witnesses. Otherwise we are impotent.

If the members of the armed services know that they cannot talk to committees without being kicked out of the service, why then we might as well abandon the functions of this committee. Certainly we cannot function properly.

Now I do not know how we are going to reach that question unless we exercise the right we have of confirming nominations. If there is a way to reach it other than by bringing the matter up when nominations are presented, I would like to know about it. I do not know about it at present.

I do not know how you are going to reach it other than to object to nominations of successors to officers who have come up and given the committee the requested information. I would like to have that question answered as to how we are going to reach it, if we do not reach it in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I do not know whether I can answer it or not, but let us assume that investigation went on for a year. In the meantime you would have no confirmed acting member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff representing the Navy or Chief of Staff of the Navy.

Senator KNOWLAND. He is acting——

The CHAIRMAN. Just let me finish. Suppose that at the end of the investigation it was found that Admiral Denfeld had a raw deal. That would not alter the question that there is a vacancy and we have to do something about it.

My thought is this: That an inquiry into the proposition would be perfectly proper if the committee desires to make it, but, regardless of the outcome of the inquiry, we will be confronted with the fact sooner or later that we must have a Chief of Naval Operations, which position is vacant, so that you would be gaining nothing by postponing what you have got to do eventually.

If I could see where the one could not be conducted without the other, that would be one thing. We can still have our investigation into the Denfeld matter, if we desire it. That has nothing to do with the fitness of Admiral Sherman to fill a vacancy which now exists.

I would like to ask Admiral Sherman, Did Admiral Denfeld finally resign?

Admiral SHERMAN. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. He has not?

Admiral SHERMAN. No, sir. He is on leave, and he has not given an indication whether he will request retirement at the end of leave or not. His leave will expire on the 19th of January.

The CHAIRMAN. Did I read in the paper a rumor or a statement to the effect that he refused, I think it was, the Mediterranean command?

Admiral SHERMAN. He was offered the assignment as commander in chief of the Eastern Atlantic and Mediterranean, and he has declined that.

Senator KEFAUVER. Admiral Sherman has misunderstood. The chairman referred to this: Did he resign as Chief of Naval Operations?

Admiral SHERMAN. It is my understanding that he did not, sir; that he was removed by order of the President.

The CHAIRMAN. I see. Well, I was wrong about that. I had been under the impression that he had resigned as Chief of Naval Operations. That is not correct. He was removed by the President.

Now, is anyone here in a position to say whether the President has that authority or whether it is in dispute?

Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Chairman, I think it ought to be very clear to Admiral Sherman here that in any of these remarks that we are not questioning, at least I am not, his fitness for the job or his ability or his patriotism or anything else. I am just looking back on this thing. Now I have got a 4-page opinion that there is not any vacancy, from very eminent counsel.

The CHAIRMAN. May we ask who it is?

Senator BRIDGES. I could not get an opinion out of the Attorney General, of course, because they will not render it to an individual thing, but this is a personal opinion of Louis Wyman to me in which he cites the possibility of a question as to whether a vacancy exists.

Now, I do not know whether that is accurate or not, but there is a difference of opinion whether or not a vacancy exists, and whether a man who was nominated for Chief of Naval Operations by the President and commended as outstanding and competent, 2 months later should suddenly become incompetent and you have to remove him. It just does not make sense to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I suppose we could get opinions on both sides in great profusion. It seems to me that what the committee is confronted with is this fact: that the President has removed Admiral Denfeld as Chief of Naval Operations.

If the President has that right, as far as I can see I would not question it because he is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and can select his own staff pretty much at will, subject to the confirmation of the Senate. That is something I have made no study about and do not attempt to be profound, but if there is that situation the question here is whether or not the nominee who has been nominated to fill the vacancy is suitable to occupy the office.

The chairman would be very glad to have an expression from the committee on what the committee would like to do about this so we can get something concrete before us in the form of a motion.

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the question right now before the committee is if one or more members of the Armed Services Committee have requested some additional time to go into this matter, feeling that the whole basic issue as to whether the committees of the Congress can have witnesses before them from the services who can testify to the truth as they see it, and are going to be disciplined because they have given testimony before a committee of Congress—I think that is a very basic issue.

The first time we have had to go into this matter is on the nomination of Admiral Sherman for Chief of Naval Operations to take the place of a man who at least some people in the country believe was removed and disciplined because he had given testimony before a committee of the Congress of the United States, when both the chairman of that committee and the Secretary of the Navy himself had publicly stated that no disciplinary action would be taken.

A second witness who appeared before the committee, Admiral Bogan, has apparently been reduced in grade and has himself asked for retirement because of a letter which was sent or a statement which was made by the Secretary of the Navy to the committee. Now I think that that is a basic issue.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman does not want to interrupt the Senator from California, but I think the record also ought to show that this whole thing started upon very grave and serious charges made in the Navy Department that the Air Force was corrupt, which has been entirely lost sight of in a great deal of this hearing.

There were very serious charges made of corruption and giving of contracts to favorites, incompetency, and so on, which was the foundation of this whole inquiry to start with, and most people seem to have forgotten that that was the genesis of it, and are talking about some of the later ramifications of it.

Senator KNOWLAND. If I might just complete my statement, Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, Admiral Sherman is acting under a recess appointment by the President as Chief of Naval Operations. He is functioning today. It is not a question of his not being able to function in that capacity.

Therefore, I do not see that any great harm can take place if this committee and the members thereof at least have sufficient time to satisfy themselves by an examination of the facts which they are seeking to get, as to whether the legislative power of the Government to get testimony has been infringed upon.

Senator BYRD. May I ask the Senator how much time he would like?

Senator KNOWLAND. Why, I would think that 2 weeks would not be an unreasonable period of time.

Senator BYRD. I am prepared today, Mr. Chairman, to vote for the confirmation of Admiral Sherman, but I think, if Senator KNOWLAND wants 2 weeks, with the distinct understanding that at the end of 2 weeks we will vote on the nomination regardless of the period of inquiry, which I approve of, I am in favor of it, but I think it would be very unfortunate to hold this nomination up for a long time.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman is inclined to feel that a request of any member of the committee for some time is always a reasonable request and should be granted. The Chair did feel that 2 weeks is a pretty long time to go into something with which most of us are generally familiar already, and, in view of the fact that the admiral here has been acting for several months, the Chair was hopeful that the Senator from California could get his facts together by this time next week and arrive at a decision.

The Chair does not want to push him, but I am just making that as a request, whether the 2 weeks could not be shortened somewhat.

Senator KNOWLAND. I would like to feel that we had 2 weeks on it. If that time can be shortened, why, I certainly am just as anxious as the chairman to shorten it, but we all have many other problems in which we are interested, and sometimes it is a little difficult to get information out of Government departments. The shortness of the time may somewhat depend on the cooperation——

The CHAIRMAN. Well, how about this, Senator KNOWLAND: This is Tuesday. Our regular meeting time is Thursday, anyway. Why not make it Thursday of next week, which would be an intermediate period between 2 weeks and a week, which would give you about 10 days.

Senator GURNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word there. I do not like to talk about time. I like to talk more about the merits of the question. Before any information comes in, before we hear from the Secretary of the Navy, if we decide in advance that we are going to handle the matter in 10 days or 2 weeks——

The CHAIRMAN. What matter do you mean, the confirmation of Admiral Sherman, or the investigation into the Denfeld matter? I am talking about the confirmation of Admiral Sherman.

Senator GURNEY. I am talking about that too, but I am talking about the more important problem as to how this committee is going to continue to get information from the armed forces without—— Senator BYRD. Is that not a separate inquiry though, Senator?

Senator GURNEY. I do not know.

Senator BYRD. I think it would be very unfortunate to hold this confirmation up indefinitely. I am perfectly willing to vote, as a courtesy to Senator KNOWLAND or any other Member, that they have reasonable time to present any facts that they do not have, but concerning becoming involved in something else which is more or less foreign, to my mind, to the question of confirming Admiral Sherman, I would have to vote for immediate action today if it is going to go into a question of months and months, which this other inquiry may take, and I am in favor of the inquiry, I might say.

The CHAIRMAN. That is my position exactly. We ought to separate the two things.

Senator BYRD. If Senator KNOWLAND wants 2 weeks, I am perfectly willing to submit the motion with the understanding that not later than 2 weeks from today——

Senator GURNEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not even want to vote on 2 weeks. Maybe I will be ready to vote tomorrow. I would like to rather have this committee ask the Secretary of the Navy to come up here and meet with us this afternoon, tomorrow, or any time.

The CHAIRMAN. On Admiral Sherman's fitness?

Senator GURNEY. No; on the other problem.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we are using Admiral Sherman as a battering ram about something that is not before the committee.

Senator GURNEY. Let us bring it before the committee, then.

The CHAIRMAN. I think it is very proper, but why should we penalize a man who comes here with clean hands, who had no part in the thing?

Senator GURNEY. I am one of those who believes that Admiral Sherman is completely fitted for the office. I like him and have known him for a long time.

The CHAIRMAN. Even if we find that Admiral Denfeld has been mistreated, or anything you want to call it, that will have no effect upon this situation, as I see it.

Senator GURNEY. I still would like to ask the Secretary of the Navy some questions, and 2 weeks does not mean anything to me. I want the questions answered.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the Chair will entertain a motion.

Senator BYRD. Let me ask a question: Would it not be just as well to have an inquiry? We have the power, this committee does, to summon anybody before us to ascertain these facts.

Senator GURNEY. Let us have them.

Senator BYRD. Nobody charges that Admiral Sherman had anything to do with it. He was not even here. He was thousands of miles away.

Senator GURNEY. I agree completely with all those statements.

Senator BYRD. Why does not the inquiry go along? It probably would take a very long time. If it started it would not be 2 weeks or 2 months.

I just cannot see why we should indefinitely postpone a consideration and action on Admiral Sherman when every member of this committee, I take it, agrees that he is eminently qualified and fitted for this position.

Senator GURNEY. Well, we decided exactly that way when we confirmed Admiral Denfeld for a 4-year term as Chief of Naval Operations.

Senator BYRD. Something was done by somebody else and Admiral Sherman had nothing to do with it. I do not see why he should be punished for it. He certainly had nothing to do with any of this.

Senator GURNEY. We want to know if the man we did confirm for office, Admiral Denfeld, created some error that justified his being removed.

Senator BYRD. That is another question.

Senator BRIDGES. We would like to know if he is legally removed.

Senator BYRD. With all deference to the opinion, I am not a lawyer but I cannot imagine that the Commander in Chief of the United States Navy cannot remove a subordinate.

Senator BRIDGES. I think probably he can, but I mean there is a question.

Senator BYRD. All right, make an investigation of that, but that is no reason to say there is no vacancy here when every reasonable person has got to realize that the Commander in Chief can remove a subordinate if he chooses to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me say this: I think Senator BYRD stated the matter. Nobody is opposing an inquiry into Admiral Denfeld's situation.

Senator BYRD. I will vote for the inquiry right now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not trying to throttle that inquiry, but even if you make it, regardless of what you find, the post of Chief of Naval Operations, in the Chair's opinion, will be vacant, so what is the use of having it vacant if you are going to vote finally, no matter what the inquiry shows, that the place is vacant and has got to be filled.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Mr. Chairman, may I just say this: I think one viewpoint that has been lost sight of, or at least has not been mentioned, is the prestige of Admiral Sherman's position and his authority over the United States Navy, which is very vital at the present time.

Now we all agree that Admiral Sherman is a good man. I say with a smile that both Admiral Denfeld and Admiral Sherman are residents of Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, that is the only bad thing I have heard against both of them.

Senator SALTONSTALL. I say this: That it seems to me that we have got to think of the prestige of the United States Navy at a time when it is in great difficulty, and Admiral Sherman, if his confirmation is held up, if we believe he is a proper man, infringes upon his authority, infringes upon the respect which other nations hold toward him and toward his office. It makes it more difficult for him to issue authority.

Now I voted for Admiral Denfeld. I have the greatest respect for him. I agree with what Senator KNOWLAND has said. I hope if we conduct such an inquiry, it will be conducted on a very high level, and in the first instance anyway in executive session, trying to find out what is the background of some of these things, but I think the sooner we confirm Admiral Sherman, the sooner we regain the prestige of the United States Navy, and that is the point, rather than Admiral Sherman as an individual.

Now the President has authority unquestionably in my opinion to kick out any Chief of Staff that he wants to at any time. I cannot believe that that is not true. It is done in wartime, it is done in peacetime if it is necessary to do it, or if in the opinion of the Commander in Chief it is necessary.

Now we have got a man whom we think is qualified. He is well chosen for the position, and I want to look at the United States Navy as a very important adjunct of our defense and our security at this time, and I would like to see Admiral Sherman confirmed as quickly as possible, and I will vote, Senator KNOWLAND and Senator BRIDGES, for an inquiry into this other thing on a high level, to try to get the facts.

Senator GURNEY. Mr. Chairman, I feel as Senator SALTONSTALL feels and has so stated. I do not think there is any chance of having Admiral Denfeld back in as Chief of Naval Operations. I do not think they would want to do it under the conditions as they exist and have existed for the last few months.

I am perfectly willing to vote for Admiral Sherman, but I do want to insist that we go ahead and get to the bottom of this so that committees of Congress can continue to get information.

The CHAIRMAN. You gentlemen can have any kind of an inquiry that a majority of the committee desires at any time about the Navy. Now so far as the Chair is concerned, he will cooperate wholeheartedly with any movement in the committee, supported by the committee, for an inquiry into this matter, if the committee desires it.

The only thing that the Chair asks is do not let us penalize Admiral Sherman. We can go right ahead with our inquiry anyway, but in the meantime, as Senator SALTONSTALL said, let us confirm Admiral Sherman, get it out of the way and then pick up the inquiry if you want it, and go to the bottom of it and get a finding.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Mr. Chairman, may I ask Senator KNOWLAND a question which would also perhaps involve Senator BRIDGES: If we voted an inquiry before we confirmed Admiral Sherman this morning on a motion by Senator KNOWLAND or Senator BRIDGES, and voted that unanimously, the method of the inquiry to be determined later by agreement and after thoughtful consideration by the committee in executive session, then would you be willing to vote for the confirmation of Admiral Sherman?

Senator KNOWLAND. No, I would not be ready to vote for the confirmation of Admiral Sherman today. I think that I am entitled to some additional time.

Senator BYRD. What is the shortest time, Senator?

Senator KNOWLAND. I would not think on a nomination of this kind—and I am just as interested as the Senator from Massachusetts is in upholding the Navy and strengthening the Navy, particularly in the Pacific and other areas, as anybody in this committee room, but I am also interested in upholding the constitutional responsibilities of the Congress of the United States, and I think that that is also important to this Republic.

Senator BYRD. Would a week from Thursday, the regular meeting day, be agreeable?

Senator KNOWLAND. That would be agreeable.

Senator BYRD. I make a motion that we vote on this nomination a week from Thursday.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me state the motion first. The motion is that the matter of the confirmation of Admiral Sherman for Chief of Staff of Naval Operations be temporarily laid aside but that on Thursday, January 19, at 10:30 a. m., the committee convene and proceed to vote upon the confirmation of Admiral Sherman without further debate.

Is that correct, sir?

Senator BYRD. Yes. I want to say further, Mr. Chairman, that I am prepared to vote for a resolution making a full investigation of these other matters that have been discussed here, at any time.

Senator SALTONSTALL. I am perfectly willing to vote for that today.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, you ought to word it pretty carefully rather than just generalize on it.

Whoever is going to sponsor it, I would suggest that they take a little time in the wording of it so that the purview of the thing clearly gets to the things you want to reach, rather than go off on just a generalization.

Go ahead, Senator MORSE.

Senator MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I have a few brief remarks. I want to say at the outset that I join in thinking that Senator KNOWLAND should have sufficient time to make inquiry into the relationship as he may see it between this nomination of Admiral Sherman and the whole naval discussion that arose incident to the House investigation, but I want to second the point of view expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Virginia that we have a great responsibility, it seems to me, of protecting the good name of the Navy, and bringing to an end what I think must be recognized to be some internal conflicts within that Department.

Now I do not know whether Admiral Denfeld was disciplined or not. The Secretary of the Navy says he was not. That is a question of fact which I think we can get answered, but I do know this, Mr. Chairman, and that is what we have a problem as a Senate committee, the House has a problem as a House committee, of not permitting ourselves to be used as a shield for improper conduct within the military branches of this Government on the ground that they are going to be protected if their misconduct happens to be disclosed at a hearing on the Hill.

Now I express my own judgment when I say that if he was not disciplined, I think he should have been, and I am not satisfied that it should have been limited to him, because after all I do not know how you can conduct the Navy under civilian heads or an army or an air force, either, under a civilian head and give to them the type of protection that they can make representations at one time that they are for unification and then subsequently in a hearing on the Hill have disclosed that they were not after all acting in good faith in regard to unification.

I think that this committee was misled in regard to the attitude of some Navy officials toward unification too, and I am perfectly willing to go into that inquiry if you want it, but I do not see why this great naval officer should be held up for very long in his confirmation, because I do not think any question can be raised as to his qualifications.

I think the sooner we get the Navy back as a part of the team, the better, and I will vote for the inquiry. I will vote as a matter of courtesy because I think BILL KNOWLAND is entitled to it, to any time he needs within reason to conduct his own investigation into Admiral Sherman's qualifications, but as far as my personal view is concerned, I want to say I did not like the whole fiasco over on the House side, and Hollywood, I think, never became quite so slapstick as the Navy did passing secret documents in the darkened doorway of an office building in Washington.

I say if discipline was not meted out, it ought to be meted out for that sort of conduct. Let us go ahead with the inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like to say, gentlemen, I promised some of the members of the committee we would only meet a half hour this morning. We are going to meet again Thursday at our regular time. The Chair has made commitments based on the fact that we would only meet a half hour.

The Chair would be very grateful if we could proceed to a vote on the Byrd motion, and we will meet again on Thursday and take up the other matter.

Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Chairman, may I ask is Admiral Sherman going to be here on Thursday?

The CHAIRMAN. He will be here any time we want him. Would you like to have him here on Thursday?

Senator BRIDGES. I would like to ask him some questions whenever it is convenient to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. I think the first thing to do is to adopt the motion that probably Senator KNOWLAND will offer Thursday about whatever type of inquiry he has in mind, before we get any other witnesses up on it, do you not think so, Senator Bridges?

Senator BRIDGES. I think so.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Mr. Chairman, you have got an important thing here, and out of this meeting is going to go the fact that Admiral Sherman's appointment is held up because we want to vote an inquiry. I think we ought to vote that inquiry before we leave this room.

The CHAIRMAN. There would be an awful lot of discussion about it, and frankly I would not want to vote on it without hearing from the Secretary of the Navy as to whether or not we ought to vote on it, and I think you are going into something about which, before we can make a decision, you have got to have some pretty cogent testimony on before you decide whether the inquiry ought to be made.

Now I happen to be in possession of one or two facts that I do not believe many people know about, and I would certainly want those facts brought out here, and it might change the whole appearance of some of the thinking here. I think the question now is on the Byrd motion as to whether or not we want to give those who want this inquiry time enough to frame a motion to bring it about.

All those in favor will signify by saying aye.

(A chorus of "ayes.")

The CHAIRMAN. Opposed.

Senator HUNT. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The "ayes" have it. The motion is carried.

NOMINATION OF ADMIRAL F. E. SHERMAN TO BE CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS

THURSDAY, JANUARY 12, 1950

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES,
Washington, D. C.

The committee met, pursuant to adjournment and subsequent notice, at 11 a. m., in room 212, Senate Office Building, Senator MILLARD E. TYDINGS (chairman) presiding.

Present: Senators TYDINGS (chairman), RUSSELL, CHAPMAN, JOHNSON of Texas, KEFAUVER, HUNT, BRIDGES, GURNEY, SALTONSTALL, MORSE, KNOWLAND, and CAIN.

The CHAIRMAN. Before we proceed further here I have a letter from Senator KNOWLAND which came in yesterday during my absence, and I have a letter from Senator KNOWLAND that came in, I think, just before I left yesterday, so I have two letters asking for—I think one of them asks—the Joint Chiefs of Staff to be called before the committee to give their opinion on whether or not Formosa is essential to our national defense; and the second letter, I think—correct me if I am wrong, Senator—came in during my absence yesterday afternoon, and it asked that Mr. Matthews be called before the committee in connection with the confirmation of Admiral Sherman. Is that correct?

Senator KNOWLAND. That is right; and that is the letter to which I wish to address myself and to direct your attention.

The CHAIRMAN. So far, of course, I could not have acted, if I wanted to, on the Matthews' thing for the very simple reason that there would not have been any opportunity to get word to him.

I did not get the letter until I came to my office this morning.

The thing that concerns me, however, even if I had been here, if it has to do with the Denfeld matter, so far as I know the committee has never voted for an inquiry into that field, and the chairman would be reluctant to call Secretary Matthews or anybody else for an investigation into a matter that the committee had not authorized.

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, if I might state so that I think the record can be clear, the letter that I addressed to the chairman yesterday, as he said—I tried to reach him by telephone, but he had the necessity to be out of the city, and I understood that—the letter reads as follows:

"DEAR SENATOR: I tried to reach you a few minutes ago, 2:30 o'clock p. m., by telephone at your office, but was informed that you had gone to Maryland and would not return until late tonight.

"It would be very much appreciated if you would invite Secretary of the Navy Matthews to attend the sessions tomorrow of the Armed Services Committee and extend this similar invitation to Admiral Louis Denfeld.

"In conformity with the desires of the committee to expedite matters relative to the nomination by the President of the new Chief of Naval Operations, I believe that this action would contribute toward that end."

I merely wish to say, Mr. Chairman, as I said to the committee the other day, I have no desire to delay beyond the date agreed to the nomination of Admiral Sherman; so far as I know, he is a very competent, able naval officer, and I have no reason to believe but that he will make an excellent Chief of Naval Operations.

I do believe, however, that this committee is entitled to make some inquiries of the Secretary of the Navy.

I am not convinced in my own mind that a full-dress inquiry would be necessary. I think, perhaps, the factual information that might be developed from a discussion with Secretary Matthews, in executive session or otherwise, might furnish some members of the committee with sufficient information so that they would not desire to pursue a full-dress inquiry.

However, I do wish to call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that not only does the Constitution of the United States itself place upon the Congress a primary r ponsibility for the raising and the supporting of armies and navies, but there appeared in Collier's magazine, which was out yesterday, January 21, 1950, an article entitled "If This Be Treason," by Rear Adm. Daniel V. Gallery, United States Navy.

Now, Admiral Gallery is a responsible, able officer of the United States Navy. In the Collier's insert, it says that Admiral Gallery has had a distinguished record of service to his country. "The 48-year-old native of Chicago saw service in both World Wars, and has been an outstanding Navy flyer since 1927. His current assignment is in Washington, where he is Assistant Chief of Naval Operations for the Guided Missiles Branch."

He is apparently a responsible, able naval officer, with a distinguished career of service, and would not be holding that position if his superiors did not think he was.

Quoting from page 16 in this article in Collier's, this is what Admiral Gallery has to say:

"Last October, on the date which was formerly Navy Day, Admiral Louis Denfeld, after 40 years of distinguished service to his country, in peace and in war, was kicked out of his job as Chief of Naval Operations. The admiral learr ed of his firing from an aide, who read about it in the newspapers. In the reshuffle, which followed, all the other top admirals who supported Denfeld were swept into the 'deep freeze.'"

Now, that is a statement which is made by a responsible naval officer. Then he goes on to say:

"But I think that the implications of the purge are even more ominous to the country than they are to the Navy, the handwriting on the wall can nov be plainly seen by military officers in the Army, Air Forces, and Marine Corps, as well as the Navy. It says, 'Conform or be liquidated.'"

I read on a little further, where he says:

"Under our form of government, the basic decisions of military policy should be made by Congress. How can these decisions be made wisely if Congress is to be denied the honest advice of the men whom the taxpayers have trained to be their experts?"

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to read the whole article, but I am going to ask that it be placed as a part of our record for Senators who might not see it in Collier's.

Now, I think they are serious statements which have been made by, presumably, a responsible officer of the United States Navy.

I do not know whether they are true or not, but I do want to most respectfully say that if we are to discharge our constitutional obligation, and that if people representing the Army and the Navy and the Air Force feel that if they come to the Armed Services Committee of the Senate or the Armed Services Committee of the House of Representatives, and answer inquiries, inquiries that we propound to them so that we may properly have information to discharge our constitutional obligation, and they feel under any duress, direct or implied, that if they answer truthfully and to the best of their ability, they may be punished, I say to you that we have a situation which the Congress of the United States should not tolerate.

I do not know whether it is true or not. I hope it is not, but I do feel as a Senator of the United States, having some responsibility, both as a member of this committee and in my capacity as a Senator, that I am entitled to direct some questions to the Secretary of the Navy to see whether those statements have any basis of fact, and that is my case, Mr. Chairman, and I respectfully ask that the chairman invite Secretary Matthews before this committee this week and, certainly I want to do nothing that will delay action on Admiral Sherman. I think I am entitled to that request.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, Senator KNOWLAND, certainly you are entitled to your point of view.

I would like to submit, however, to you and the other members of the committee, certain facts with respect to this case that I think ought to receive some attention.

In the first place, no promise was made to the Senate Committee on Armed Services regarding this whole incident. It was made to a committee of the armed services of the House of Representatives.

The Senate was not a party to the investigation, was not a party to the inquiry. It did not elicit the promise from those in authority about purges, and so forth, and the incidents all took place before our sister committee or fellow committee, if you please, in another branch of this Government.

If there has been any affront, if there has been any violation of an understanding, if there has been anything unconstitutional, if there has been anything unconstitutional or untoward or unwarranted, it seems to me that the House of Representatives, where the whole thing occurred, the court in which the litigation is pending, so to speak, is the proper committee to investigate it, and I have understood from things I have read in the press, one of them being a statement from my own colleague, Congressman SASSCER, who serves on the Armed Services Committee, that the matter is to be looked into by the House of Representatives.

Now, it would be most unbecoming, in my opinion, for us to inject ourselves into a matter that is pending before the House of Representatives, and which has not been formally concluded. That is No. 1.

The second thing is that in order to expedite this whole matter and to give you access to any information that you want, I took the liberty yesterday of calling the Secretary of the Navy, and telling him what transpired here in the morning, and I told him that I thought it would be very helpful if you and he could sit down together, and you could ask him any questions you wanted, and he could give you what he knew about it, and put you in a position of being in possession of all the facts with respect to it upon which you could make a fuller determination as to whether or not you felt the facts in this article, and other articles, were complete and worthy of further action on the part of the House committee or ourselves.

The Secretary told me he would be very glad to meet with you, to go over this whole matter fully, to answer any questions that you wanted to ask him, and to put you in possession of everything that was possible.

Now, would it not be wiser for you to do that and to find out whether or not the thing in a prima facie way is worthy of further investigation than it would be to have a full-dress hearing about something that is pending in another body all the time?

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, if I might answer most respectfully——

The CHAIRMAN. Let me just say, and then, coupled with that, I also got your letter that we called the three Joint Chiefs of Staff up here to investigate whether or not Formosa was this, that, or the other thing.

Now, that hearing is going on at the present time before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate, and you attended one of the hearings there yesterday. Our province here as the Committee on Armed Services is to defend where our Army is, and where our commitments are. So far as I know, we have no commitment in Formosa.

Senator BRIDGES. But, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Just let me finish. My point is this, that if that inquiry is to be made as to whether or not Formosa should or should not be defended, it seems to me it ought to be made by the Foreign Relations Committee.

They make international policy. This committee is a defense committee.

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, if I might just briefly say one thing.

The CHAIRMAN. Let me continue—we will not do anything but investigate the whole time that we are here if we get into all these things.

Senator KNOWLAND. Just let me say this: In the first place, the letter that the Secretary wrote to Mr. VINSON, and which——

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. VINSON, chairman of the Armed Services Committee of the House?

Senator KNOWLAND. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Why does not Mr. VINSON call him to task?

Senator KNOWLAND. My point is that the policy as laid down, as I understood it to be laid down, by the Navy and the Defense Department, is that witnesses come before the committees of the Congress, both committees, and we have a responsibility that we cannot delegate to the House, or the House cannot delegate to us, and I do not believe that we can be unconcerned about injustices taking place, and wait on the House with respect to the matter.

They are within their province in going ahead with such inquiries as they want.

I have not demanded a full-scale investigation. I have sought through the proper medium of a Senate committee to carry on in such a way so that we might get some information.

Now, I am not the only member of this committee who believes that we are entitled to this information.

The CHAIRMAN. Why do you not go down and see Secretary Matthews?

Senator KNOWLAND. Because I do not feel that as a member of the Armed Services Committee on this particular issue that is a proper way to handle it.

The CHAIRMAN. We can still vote for the investigation, but we certainly ought to find out, before we go to all this trouble, whether or not the facts are as stated.

Senator KNOWLAND. Is there any reason that you can think of why——

The CHAIRMAN. What does Admiral Gallery know what took place?

Senator KNOWLAND (continuing). He should not come down to discuss matters with the members of the Armed Services Committee?

The CHAIRMAN. I have already invited him. He says he will come; you can have any talk you want to. You have it public or private.

I am talking about a committee hearing, and to say that you do not want a full-dress hearing, when nobody knows where these hearings will go—we might be here for a month. As a matter of fact, we might be summoning the same witnesses on the same case in both Houses at the same time on the same investigation.

Senator KNOWLAND. Now, Mr. Chairman, all I have asked for is that this committee, and the other members who, I believe, also have and should have an interest in this situation, all I have asked is that this committee might invite the Secretary of the Navy to come before us and answer some questions which we would like to propound, and carry on a discussion with him, as members of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. You certainly can do that without any workings on the part of the Chair.

Senator KNOWLAND. Can we have him here tomorrow?

The CHAIRMAN. No; you can have him all you wish. All that you have to do is to call him and you may meet, if you wish, in this room.

Senator KNOWLAND. I do not want to have him individually, but I want to have him as a member of the Armed Services Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. All right, let us find out what the committee wants.

Senator KNOWLAND. All right, Mr. Chairman, then I move you that the Secretary of the Navy be invited to appear before the Senate Armed Services Committee to answer certain questions as the committee might care to direct to him.

The CHAIRMAN. About what subject?

Senator KNOWLAND. About the subject of whether officers of the Navy are being punished or have been punished for giving testimony before a committee of Congress of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. You have heard the motion, gentlemen. What is the decision?

Senator SALTONSTALL. Mr. Chairman, a fellow who tries to get in the middle always gets his head knocked off by both sides. I hope we do not have to vote on any such motion as that. If I have to vote on it, I would vote formally.

The CHAIRMAN. Vote how?

Senator SALTONSTALL. I did not say how I would vote. I said formally.

The CHAIRMAN. Formally; yes.

Senator SALTONSTALL. I would amend, if I had to, Senator KNOWLAND'S motion, to ask Mr. Matthews to come down here in connection with the confirmation of Admiral Sherman.

Now, there are perfectly good grounds for that: On the ground that we confirmed Admiral Denfeld a few months ago, and there was great publicity concerning his resignation or his retirement as Chief of Staff.

Therefore, there is certainly a proper inquiry, if any member of the committee wants to make it, in connection with why there was a retirement and, therefore, why, if this man is capable of doing so, of succeeding him. Now, that is putting it in technical language.

I say, most respectfully, that I do not see that that involves us in the full inquiry that is now before the House. It seems to me that Secretary Matthews, being the civilian head of the Navy, if any Member requests it, we should permit him to ask questions in connection with the confirmation of a man in uniform.

Now, I would hope that we would not be forced to vote formally on whether or not to bring Mr. Matthews before us, because it seems to me to divide the committee, or it may divide the committee, most unfortunately, on a subject where that is not necessary.

Senator KNOWLAND. I will amend my motion, and I am perfectly willing to withdraw the motion, as I stated it, and to ask that the Secretary of the Navy be invited to appear before the Armed Services Committee relative to the nomination of the Chief of Naval Operations and for such inquiries as the committee might desire to make.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the same thing, is it not, only it is made a little more palliative by sugar-coating, but the purpose is to inquire—let us be frank and honest about it—into the circumstances surrounding Admiral Denfeld's tenure of office.

Senator KNOWLAND. No; that is not the only thing.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not say only; I said that is the primary purpose of it.

Senator KNOWLAND. No; my primary purpose is to find out whether there is any attempt being made to prevent members of the armed services from giving their honest opinions to the Congress of the United States in response to inquiries directed by a regularly constituted committee of the Senate or the House of Representatives, as the case may be. I think that is a basic issue.

The CHAIRMAN. Without reference to the Denfeld case or with particular reference to it?

Senator KNOWLAND. No, I think that is only one facet of the situation.

Senator JOHNSON. Has the Senator any indication that such attempts have been made, so far as our committee is concerned?

Senator KNOWLAND. I do not know. I read the statement to the Senator this morning, which just came to my attention yesterday, and I think there are rather serious implications in that statement made by a responsible naval officer.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Mr. Chairman, may I say something?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator MORSE has attempted to speak several times. All right, Senator SALTONSTALL.

Senator SALTONSTALL. I just, to complete my statement, would like to say that I would hope that Senator KNOWLAND'S request, as an individual member of this committee, would be either granted or that I would like to see Mr. Matthews volunteer to come before this committee at the earliest possible moment, this afternoon preferably.

The CHAIRMAN. There have been no charges filed before this committee.

Senator SALTONSTALL. No, but there has been some publicity given out with respect to the building up of Sherman, and so on.

I say, sir, that I would hope that that could be done without putting a formal vote on, and in connection with the confirmation of Admiral Sherman.

It would seem to me that any member were entitled to ask the civilian head of the Navy any questions that he might want, concerning his Chief of Naval Operations.

For instance, just to put an extreme case, Mr. Matthews might not agree at all with the policies of Admiral Sherman. Therefore, we are entitled, as a confirming body, to know that he does approve of Admiral Sherman's appointment. Presumably he does; of course, he does, but assume a set of facts, then it seems to me that any individual member of the committee, without a formal vote, is entitled to do that, and I think, as I said the other day, the prestige of the Navy, the authority of Admiral Sherman in Russia, in England, in France, and everywhere else, is involved in this thing, and I would hope that we could eliminate it as soon as we could, and in a simpler way which, it seems to me, is to either ask Mr. Matthews to come before the committee or have Mr. Matthews volunteer to come before the committee.

I am through, sir, and, as I say, I do not want to get into the middle between two people, two friends or colleagues, or the chairman and an individual member.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose the House wanted to investigate it, would it make any difference?

Senator SALTONSTALL. Not the slightest difference. It seems to me Senator KNOWLAND has made a personal request with respect to the confirmation to a very important post, and we should do it as promptly as possible; we should not get into a disagreement in the committee concerning it, where a motion is forced.

Senator BRIDGES. If Senator MORSE will speak, I will withhold what I want to say until he is through.

Senator MORSE. You will not have to hold it very long, because I have three very brief points to make.

Mr. Chairman, my first one goes to the matter of committee procedure. We have before us the nomination of Admiral Sherman. I think it is perfectly reasonable and proper for an individual member of this committee, or in this instance I think it happens to be more than one, to ask the committee to bring before the committee the Secretary of the Navy for the purpose of discussing that nomination.

Now, there is no sense in our trying to run away from the fact that in the discussion of that nomination it is going to get into this whole question of the Secretary's views with respect to the Denfeld matter, but I think, as a matter of committee policy, it would be unwise to establish any precedent here in regard to the Knowland request of denying it.

Therefore, my second point is that I think that we ought to proceed in executive session—at least to the point of getting the Secretary's point of view and deciding for ourselves in executive session after we have it—as to whether or not there is any reason for our extending the hearing to any open session. I think that is something that we would decide at a later date after we talked to the Secretary.

The third point I would make is that this committee has had a remarkable record under this chairman and preceding chairmen of working cooperatively in the interests of promoting the best security policy of this Nation through our Military Establishment, and I do not think in this session of Congress we should permit this incident to develop into an area for misunderstanding among us as Senators.

I think we can sit down here in executive session with the Secretary of the Navy and reach some very definite understandings to get the atmosphere, at least, cleared within the committee.

Now, I happen to be one who does not believe that the Armed Services Committee of either the House or the Senate should ever be used by the military as a sanctuary in which to hide their insubordination, and I happen to be one who is of the opinion that this incident is one in which the House committee was used as a sanctuary for the purpose of hiding what I think was some pretty reprehensible conduct on the part of some Navy officials, but I am perfectly willing to sit here and listen to points of view that may prove me wrong, with respect to that, but we have got to watch out that we do not permit ourselves to be a territory in which these officers can run, and, once having testified before us, then be protected for all time in the future for conduct unbecoming officers.

I think that is part of this problem, so I would support the Knowland motion, if it would include a provision or understanding that we proceed, at least in the first instance, in executive session, in regard to the Sherman nomination, and ask the Secretary of the Navy to come before us in connection with that nomination.

Senator KNOWLAND. That is perfectly agreeable, and I think I mentioned the executive session.

Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Chairman, on the question of the Knowland request or the Knowland motion, I have been a member of this Armed Services Committee since it was created, and prior to that a member of the old Military Affairs Committee, on both of them for some 14 years, and I have never known of the request of a single member of the committee on a subject that was pertinent, where they have asked a witness to appear, that that request has been denied, and I certainly do not want to see that precedent established so far as Senator KNOWLAND is concerned. If it is, certainly I do not care to be a member of the committee, and I do not think anybody else would if it were that.

I certainly do not think that the interests and the good of the country or the proper conduct of the Senate would call for or allow that to happen.

My other point was just a personal point on a remark that you made, Mr. Chairman, which is possibly something where there is, perhaps, a matter of opinion, but where you said that we had no interest in——

The CHAIRMAN. I did not say we had no interest in——

Senator BRIDGES (continuing). In Formosa.

The CHAIRMAN. I said we had no jurisdiction.

Senator BRIDGES. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Which is an entirely different situation.

Senator BRIDGES. All right. Then, I want to show you how I think we have——

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, all the Senators have an interest in it, but as far as making policy about Formosa, I do not think the Armed Services Committee is the committee to do it, regardless of what the facts are.

Senator BRIDGES. All right. Let me tell you what I think about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you agree with that?

Senator BRIDGES. No.

The CHAIRMAN. That we ought to make the policy?

Senator BRIDGES. Let me say this, Mr. Chairman: Formosa today is part of Japan.

The CHAIRMAN. Agreeing that we ought to hold it, we ought to put everything we have got there, and all that, this is not the committee to decide that, is my point.

Senator BRIDGES. Well, it certainly is a committee that could properly consult with the Chiefs of the Armed Forces.

The CHAIRMAN. So could every committee, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and other committees, because they all have an interest.

Senator BRIDGES. You are being facetious about that.

The CHAIRMAN. I am not facetious at all. What is the use of having a Foreign Relations Committee if you are going to have your other committees do this which you suggest here? Would you think that the House Armed Services Committee would be the proper committee to take up the policy on Formosa?

Senator BRIDGES. I certainly think it is within their province, certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought foreign relations were primarily the thing that the Senate concerned itself about.

Senator BRIDGES. If you will just let me finish here, I understood you to say——

The CHAIRMAN. Even if the Senate Foreign Relations Committee wants to occupy Formosa, I, as an individual, both as a member of that committee and this one, would be violently opposed to it, and will have plenty to say about it on the floor of the United States Senate, if I have anything to say on it.

I am not going to start another war inadvertently.

Senator BRIDGES. I will tell you that if some people had spoken up back in the time when we were——

The CHAIRMAN. You fellows who want war out there can go ahead and fight it. I do not want any war.

Senator BRIDGES. Do you think we would be any more subject to war than we were at the Berlin air lift or——

The CHAIRMAN. We were already in Berlin, but we are not in Formosa; it is a different situation. When you find yourself on the football field and on a team you have to play, but if you are sitting up in the gallery watching somebody else play you do not have to come down and carry the ball.

Senator BRIDGES. Now, let me ask you this: Who do you think owns Formosa today?

The CHAIRMAN. Well, according to the preliminary Japanese peace treaty, we said that Formosa belonged to the Chinese, was stolen from them by the Japanese, and, therefore, should be returned to the Chinese.

Senator BRIDGES. But there has been no Japanese peace treaty yet.

The CHAIRMAN. I am talking about the surrender terms which we signed with the Japanese people on the battleship Missouri, which contains a provision that Formosa is to be ceded to the Chinese.

Senator BRIDGES. But it has not been formally ceded yet.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, certainly, it has not been ceded to us. We never won it by conquest; we have not anything more to do with it than Siam has, which is not too far from it.

Senator BRIDGES. Well, how about some of the other islands?

The CHAIRMAN. Let us talk about what our responsibility is.

Senator BRIDGES. Well, I say that up until the time that——

The CHAIRMAN. Why should we not land on Hainan and hold it?

Senator BRIDGES. Maybe we should.

The CHAIRMAN. Why should we not take all the Pescadores and hold them? Why not go and fortify the British in Hong Kong?

Senator BRIDGES. I think that we certainly should. We have gone through a period here back some days when we saw World War II coming on, and if we had taken some positive action in some of the other things, we might not have gone through World War II, and we are going through the same thing today.

The CHAIRMAN. You go back to the votes on the building up of the Air Force, and you will find where the lack of positive action happened. I put them all in the record here 4 or 5 years ago.

Senator BRIDGES. It was not anything on my part.

The CHAIRMAN. There was not on your vote, but you will find where the votes were that prevented preparedness and the extension of the draft, and all those things, so that when you are talking about affirmative action, you are not talking about me.

Senator BRIDGES. I am not accusing you of it.

The CHAIRMAN. And I am not accusing you of it.

Senator BRIDGES. But there are certain people on the other side, a good many of them today, who have changed their tune today, and they are certainly on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. I certainly hope that we will not do anything about Formosa, as long as the situation is like it is. It may change or it might be advisable, but not today.

Senator BRIDGES. I certainly hope we do, so there is a difference of opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. In the meantime, Senator GURNEY wants the floor to make one of his eloquent speeches, which I always like to listen to.

Senator GURNEY. As usual, the Chairman is again flattering me, because he knows I am not eloquent. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. I am not; that is an understatement.

Senator GURNEY. I want to join with the gist of the statement that was enunciated by Senator BRIDGES. So long as I have been in the Senate, I have been a member of the Military Affairs, and Armed Services Committee, and never has there been, I do not remember an instance, where a witness was called for by any member of the committee, especially in executive session—I will confine it to that—where there has been any effort by the chairman or any member of the committee to stop that witness from coming up and talking to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Understand me, Senator——

Senator GURNEY. I think it is a very bad precedent to establish.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). I think that will be perfectly proper, if you will allow me to interrupt you—that is not the point at all. If we were considering only the witness, as a matter of testifying on the fitness of Admiral Sherman, that would be one thing; but what we are really doing by the back door is ordering an investigation into the removal of Admiral Denfeld, and that is the thing that the committee ought to pass on.

Senator GURNEY. I do not want to argue with the Chairman. I just want to leave it as my belief that when a member of a committee asks for a witness in executive session—I will confine it to executive session—there never has been an instance in my memory where it has been refused, and I do not think that this committee wants to get into that position, and I certainly hope that the committee will sustain the request of Senator KNOWLAND.

That is the end of my eloquent statement.

The CHAIRMAN. You have made a good statement, and if you will allow me just so I will not be misunderstood, I have no objection in the world to calling Secretary Matthews, or the President or the Vice President or anybody else, about any matter that the committee wants to take up.

What we have pending before us is the nomination of Admiral Sherman, and I do not want to start an investigation into something else informally under the pretext that we are holding it to confirm Admiral Sherman or reject that motion.

Senator GURNEY. Well, the committee has not yet decided whether they want to make an inquiry or not, and certainly any member of this committee, in order to decide whether or not he should hold an inquiry, is entitled to have as a witness, especially, the Secretary of the Navy, in order to find out and make up his mind as to whether we should have an inquiry or not.

The CHAIRMAN. My point is that we are going about having an inquiry without really formally asking for the inquiry to be made.

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully suggest that is not the case in this situation. As a member of this committee——

The CHAIRMAN. It is my view, Senator.

Senator KNOWLAND. I have requested that Secretary Matthews appear in executive session. We have the question of the new Chief of Naval Operations to take the place of one whom we confirmed just a few months ago.

Now, I certainly do not think that even the chairman of this committee wants to establish a precedent that a member of this committee is going to be gagged and not permitted to ask pertinent questions when a witness comes before the committee, and I think it is a very basic issue.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman is not going to have words put in his mouth. He is not attempting to gag anybody. He has just finished saying that he will be very glad to have Secretary Matthews appear before the committee in connection with the fitness of Admiral Forrest P. Sherman to hold this office.

What the committee chairman is saying is that he does not want that situation used as a pretext to launch a full-scale investigation into something that the committee has not so far agreed to investigate; just get the nose of the camel in under the tent, and have a whole investigation about something which was never ordered by the full committee, that is my point, and that is exactly what will happen.

Nobody is going to ask Secretary Matthews if he thinks Admiral Sherman is fit to be the Chief of Naval Operations. What they are going to ask him is to ask him about the circumstances that have to bear on the removal, if you want to call it that, of Admiral Denfeld, and so far as I know, an investigation of that kind ought to be ordered specially and not be taken up left-handed and indirectly.

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully suggest that the only way the members of this committee can make up their minds as to whether a further inquiry is either necessary or desirable is to be able to direct some pertinent questions to the Secretary of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. You can do that.

Senator KNOWLAND. I hope that no such further inquiry will be necessary, but I certainly do not intend to be throttled or gagged in this committee in asking what I believe are pertinent questions in order to discharge my obligation as a Senator of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, I have got an obligation, too, and the obligation is to conduct this committee in a businesslike and parliamentary fashion.

If you want an investigation of the removal of Admiral Denfeld, then let us make a motion to that effect, and have it. Let us not go in and have it under the guise that we are investigating Admiral Sherman, that is my point.

I like things frank and open and aboveboard and on the table, and what we are trying to do here is to have an investigation of the removal of Admiral Denfeld under the guise of an investigation of Admiral Sherman for this fitness. I do not think that is the way to proceed.

If the committee wants to do it, it is all right with me, but I want my position thoroughly understood, and there are no efforts being made to gag anybody. You could sit down this afternoon with Secretary Matthews and get an answer to any question you wanted to propound, and on that information you could then come before the committee and submit a case that would justify or not justify an investigation.

What we are doing here is fishing in the open for a whole lot of information that we could get in 10 minutes' conversation with the Secretary.

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I renew my request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any comment from you gentlemen on the right here who have been silent?

Senator KEFAUVER. Mr. Chairman, I came in a little late, and I do not know whether this has been discussed or not, but after all, is not this a matter that is being investigated and in particular pertains to the House of Representatives? That is where the whole matter took place.

Senator BRIDGES. That is not Senator KNOWLAND's motion. Why do you not state your motion again?

Senator KEFAUVER. I am sorry, but I would appreciate if he stated it again.

Senator KNOWLAND. My motion was that the Secretary of the Navy be invited to appear before the Senate Armed Services Committee in executive session relative to the pending nomination of the Chief of Naval Operations.

Senator KEFAUVER. May I ask, Senator KNOWLAND, if you say that it was relative to Admiral Sherman or whether we are going to try to go into this matter that the House is going to go into?

I served in the House of Representatives, and we never did think very highly of the Senate's taking up something that particularly affected the House, and I know those gentlemen over there on the Armed Services Committee are fully capable of taking care of it themselves.

Senator KNOWLAND. I do not intend to press for an investigation of the unification fight that went on in the House. I do not intend to press for the investigation they are conducting, as I understand it from the newspapers, on the state of our defenses.

The Senate has a peculiar responsibility in confirmations which the House does not have.

Just a few months ago, the name of Admiral Denfeld was sent before the committee for a 4-year term, and within a few months of that time, having been recommended to us, and we having confirmed him, he was summarily removed.

A new nomination has been sent to us. The questions that I want to ask, I believe, are pertinent to the subject under discussion, and I make the request as a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, having a peculiar responsibility not only in the matter of confirmation under the Constitution, which the House does not have, but also in our coequal responsibilities under the Constitution of the United States for providing for the national defense and the support of the armed forces.

Senator KEFAUVER. Mr. Chairman, I have one further observation. I have never known—of course, we have very frequent examples or occasions where some member of the Cabinet, a high Government official whom we may like or not like—he is dismissed from the Government service, and then his successor is nominated.

I have never known of Congress or the Senate to go into the question of what happened leading up to the letting out or to the resignation of the previous official in connection with whether the new man is fit or not fit to hold the particular position.

It seems to me that we are going pretty far afield, unless this is to be directed at the matter of fitness of Admiral Sherman, and I have not heard anybody raise any question about his ability or his training or his character.

The CHAIRMAN. I will have no objection to calling the Secretary, calling Secretary Matthews, up here, if it is confined entirely to the fitness of Admiral Sherman.

My point is that we ought not to have the fitness of Admiral Sherman used as a pretext to launch an investigation without our formally agreeing to an investigation in this committee.

There is no use talking, Senator KNOWLAND, from the very articles that he has read, shows that the purpose of calling Secretary Matthews is to launch an investigation into the alleged breach of trust on the part of the Navy to the effect that if Navy officers testified certain ways, contrary, perhaps, to the thought of the Navy, there would be reprisals, and that is the sole purpose of Senator KNOWLAND's wanting Secretary Matthews up here.

I think Senator KNOWLAND will admit that.

Senator KNOWLAND. No, that is not the sole reason, I respectfully suggest, Mr. Chairman; I have stated my position that I think that all of us, as members of this committee, have a responsibility to discharge to the Armed Services Committee, and to the defense of this country, and I do not take a second place to anyone on this committee in being interested in the maintenance of the armed services of the United States.

I have tried to the best of my ability to do so, and in the discharge of that responsibility I believe I am entitled to direct some pertinent questions to the Secretary, and I want to know if, as a member of this committee, I am to be denied this opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to reiterate my own point that if the committee wants to vote for an investigation into the circumstances surrounding the removal of Admiral Denfeld from the post of Chief of Naval Operations, that is one thing.

If they want to inquire into the fitness of Admiral Sherman, that is another thing, but let us have a frank statement of what the committee is to do, and not use the qualifications of Admiral Sherman to indirectly launch an investigation into something that the committee has not directly authorized.

Senator CHAPMAN. Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator CHAPMAN.

Senator CHAPMAN. Did I correctly understand that the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire intends to raise the question as to whether a vacancy exists in this office?

Senator BRIDGES. Well, very frankly, let me tell the distinguished Senator from Kentucky that I have an opinion which raised that question. I do not think—certainly, I am not going to press it at this point, so I will not raise that question.

The CHAIRMAN. That is settled.

Senator BRIDGES. But I believe in the minds of some people there may be a small question, but there is some question about it.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that is sound. I think some people do question it, but you do not intend to raise that question?

Senator BRIDGES. No.

Senator CHAPMAN. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other remarks? Senator JOHNSON, what is your thought on this matter?

Senator JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I think every member of the committee ought to have the right to ask any questions of any proper people concerning the fitness and qualifications of Admiral Sherman.

I feel very much as the chairman does that if Senator KNOWLAND and some other members want to go into the Denfeld case, I have no objection to their doing that.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Senator JOHNSON. I do not want them to use me, put me at a table and bring their photographers and their newspaper reporters, and let me participate and provide a forum for going off on a tangent on an entirely different matter.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Senator JOHNSON. If they want information, Senator KNOWLAND could call the Secretary of the Navy and invite Senator BRIDGES around to his office, and I am sure the Secretary of the Navy will answer any questions they may want to ask him. If he does not answer them, then he may want to come before the committee and ask the committee to summon the Secretary up here. But so far as I am concerned, I am satisfied with the qualifications of Admiral Sherman, his fitness.

I am ready to vote now. If some other Senator is not, I have no objection to his pursuing any inquiries he wants to, but I served as a member of the House long enough to know that the chairman, the very able chairman, of that committee is not going to have to rely on a single member of the Senate Armed Services Committee to protect himself from any injustices that may have been done to him, and so far as I am concerned, I do not know what kind of commitments were made to the House committee, I do not know what statements the chairman of that committee made to the naval officers testifying, but whatever they were, I am sure that before this session is over with, Chairman VINSON will be perfectly able to take care of any commitments he made, and any commitments anybody else made.

So far as I am concerned, if you want to have the Secretary up here to testify on the qualifications and the fitness of Admiral Sherman, I am ready to send for him now. If you want to have him up here to use us as a sounding board and publicity forum to perhaps attack some branch of the service or to go into this unification field, I am against it.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator HUNT?

Senator HUNT. Mr. Chairman, I am rather discouraged that this matter has opened up again. To my way of thinking, the Navy, especially, has been ridiculous in a situation, and I had hoped that they would let up; and apparently they have not.

Secondly, the Army also has, of course, taken some criticism, as well as the Air Corps; in fact, the whole United States Armed Services have been in a bad light, as has Congress, too, from this situation.

Now, I cannot see that any good purpose would be served by having the Secretary come up, providing questions are absolutely limited to the fitness of Admiral Sherman, for there has been no evidence to the contrary.

If we, in our own minds, had some doubt as to the fitness of Admiral Sherman, then I would, perhaps, be the first to suggest that we have the Secretary come up and appear before us, but I am very reluctant, Mr. Chairman, to see this whole question of unification opened up and battled against, because in the last analysis, the question is, Who is going to run the Army and the Navy, the Congress or the Navy?

The CHAIRMAN. The civilian or military.

Senator HUNT. My position on this would necessarily have to be, Mr. Chairman, that I would now oppose the request of the distinguished Senator from California, but it is discouraging to see it come up.

Secondly, though, I would need to have some qualifications with reference to the invitation, namely, that they be limited to the qualifications of Admiral Sherman.

The CHAIRMAN. In other words, you would have no objection to the Secretary's testifying exclusively to the fitness of Admiral Sherman?

Senator HUNT. Absolutely not.

The CHAIRMAN. But you do not want to have it come up and start an investigation into a matter that the committee has not ordered, an investigation to be had which was not ordered.

Now, I would suggest to Senator KNOWLAND—he is perfectly within his rights in wanting, if he wants an investigation into the removal of Admiral Denfeld—to say so, and submit it to the committee, in which event, call all the witnesses who are pertinent to that inquiry.

I want it distinctly understood that my whole opposition to the procedure that has been embodied in this motion is because I think that what will happen is that we will do very little about finding out anything about the fitness of Admiral Sherman, but will devote ourselves almost exclusively to an investigation into the circumstances concerning the removal of Admiral Denfeld, and if that is to be the purpose of it, that is to be the result of it, then we ought to have this clearly put before the committee, and vote on that as a separate matter.

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to say for the last time, I do not believe the Chairman has any right to question the motives of the Senator from California for the reasons that he wants the Secretary of the Navy here in order to properly, Mr. Chairman, inform himself on the discharge of his duties as a member of the committee.

I shall not serve any longer as a member of the committee if I am to be gagged in the questions that I can ask the Secretary of the Navy or any other witness before this committee.

I shall not under any circumstances bind myself to limit myself to any particular questions when the Secretary is here. I shall ask him questions which I believe to be pertinent to the issue; I shall only ask him questions that I believe to be pertinent to the issue.

The CHAIRMAN. What issue?

Senator KNOWLAND. To the issue of a vacancy in the office of Chief of Naval Operations, and to the defense of this Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I thought.

Senator KNOWLAND. And when the answers are given, I shall then make up my mind, as other Senators are entitled to do, as to whether the answers are satisfactory or whether at that time to press for a further inquiry.

I have no present intention of pressing for a full-dress inquiry, but I am not going to agree to be bound and gagged as a member of this committee, and if an effort is made to do so, I shall tender my resignation as a member of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, if there is anybody who has ever been bound and gagged on this committee during either the term of my predecessor or myself, so far as I can recall, I do not know of such incident.

Let me say, so long as you have raised this question, that this is the only major committee of the Senate that stands seven to six.

The chairman of this committee has been asked several times if he wanted an eight-to-five committee. It is very nice to have a majority sitting on your own side that you can usually get on matters of this or similar types to agree on with you. Every chairman likes to have a good, big bunch of support that under normal conditions he can call on.

As late as 2 weeks ago this chairman said, no, he would stand on his seven-six proposition, and the eight-to-five proposition went to the Committee on Finance, so I just want to let you know that the chairman of this committee has leaned over backwards to give the minority party the fullest representation possible on this committee, and sometimes he has been criticized by some of his colleagues for that attitude.

Certainly, in view of that fact, you cannot say there has been any partisanship or gagging or anything else, because the record shows that the chairman has tried to keep this on a thoroughly bipartisan and fair basis.

Further than that, Senator CAIN came to the chairman and said he would like to serve on this committee, and I told him if he was a military man, we would be delighted to have him, but I have no say on it, but I would not do anything in the caucus to prevent him from getting a place on this committee, although I would like very much to have had in some cases a little more membership of my own party on it, so that when you make the charge that there has been some attempt to gag anybody here, the facts refute it completely.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Mr. Chairman, in the instance——

The CHAIRMAN. Let me finish. Furthermore, all the personnel that were appointed by my predecessor, to the last stenographer, have been kept right on the pay roll here. How many other committees have kept them? They have wiped them out in practically every other committee in the Congress. I have appointed not one single expert.

Senator GURNEY. That is because the——

The CHAIRMAN. Because what? It is because the chairman of the Armed Services Committee has had more consideration for his colleagues in the other party than any other chairmen have had who have come into power since the Eighty-first Congress, and I expect to get kicked overboard for it if the circumstances ever change, and to get no consideration at all.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Mr. Chairman, may I say, with a smile, and with the utmost sincerity, that with one exception in the 5 years that I have served on this committee, and the Committee on Naval Affairs before it, where you and I were members, that I have never heard a partisan vote. There was only one place where there might be said to be partisanship.

Now, I have just one more suggestion to make. In the interests of the committee as a whole, and since this is a public session, I want to make this further observation: a Member of the Senate, a member of the committee, has made a request. I hope that that request will be granted. He has stated that he would be agreeable, and we all expect that when the Secretary of the Navy appears, that it will be in executive session here. When the Secretary of the Navy comes, and I hope he is asked to come at 2 o'clock this afternoon or earlier, the committee can, if any member asks a question that is deemed unwise, improper, or anything else, have the vote in executive session on the question of the member. The member can then determine what he wants to do about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator SALTONSTALL, may I interrupt you just long enough to say——

Senator SALTONSTALL. I am through.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). That is an impractical procedure.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Let us have the Secretary of the Navy come here without a formal vote, divided as to whether he should or should not come, and then argue out these questions in executive session privately when he comes.

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think we have made our point clear, Senator SALTONSTALL. I have no objection to the Secretary of the Navy's coming. I have no objection to the committee's going fully into the removal of Admiral Denfeld, if that is what the committee wants to do.

What I object to is calling the Secretary ostensibly on the question of the fitness of Admiral Sherman, and then having an investigation into the removal of Admiral Denfeld.

If Senator KNOWLAND will amend his motion so as to say that an investigation should be had into the removal of Admiral Denfeld, and that the Secretary of the Navy be called as the first witness, why, then, that will be one thing. But, for heaven's sake, let us not be so childish as to suppose that if we call the Secretary of the Navy up here in reference to the fitness of Admiral Sherman that it is going to stop there and we are not going to have that investigation, because that is silly.

We might as well be frank about it, and tell the American people what we are going to investigate, and with no disrespect to anyone, because it is probably unintentional, but, in my opinion, this is a procedure that takes on the character of a subterfuge rather than a frank, open attack on the removal of Denfeld, if that is what is to be examined into.

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion, in view of the chairman's statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state it again?

Senator KNOWLAND. My motion is that the Secretary of the Navy be invited to attend a session of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate of the United States on the pending question of the nomination of a new Chief of Naval Operations.

The CHAIRMAN. Is that all?

Senator KNOWLAND. In executive session.

The CHAIRMAN. You want it confined to that?

Senator KNOWLAND. No; and I do not intend to be gagged or confined in the questions that I shall ask the Secretary at that time. I will not ask any questions which I do not believe are pertinent.

The CHAIRMAN. For the reasons that I have already stated, I cannot go along with you on that. If you had made it to investigate Denfeld or to pass on the fitness of Admiral Sherman, I would probably ride along with you.

Now, there are 10 of us present here, and we cannot vote any proxies on this thing, because I do not think it would be fair to have those who have not heard the discussion cast a vote one way or the other. Is that agreeable to the committee?

Senator BRIDGES. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. All right. The clerk will call the roll.

The CLERK. Mr. RUSSELL?

The CHAIRMAN. Absent.

The CLERK. Senator BYRD?

The CHAIRMAN. Absent.

The CLERK. Mr. CHAPMAN?

Senator CHAPMAN. No.

The CLERK. Senator JOHNSON?

Senator JOHNSON. No.

The CLERK. Mr. KEFAUVER?

Senator KEFAUVER. No.

The CLERK. Mr. HUNT?

Senator HUNT. No.

The CLERK. Mr. BRIDGES?

Senator BRIDGES. Aye.

The CLERK. Mr. GURNEY?

Senator GURNEY. Aye.

The CLERK. Mr. SALTONSTALL?

Senator SALTONSTALL. Aye.

The CLERK. Mr. MORSE?

Senator MORSE. Aye.

The CLERK. Mr. KNOWLAND?

Senator KNOWLAND. Aye.

The CLERK. Mr. CAIN?

The CHAIRMAN. Absent.

The CLERK. The chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Senator KNOWLAND. I might say Mr. Chairman, with reference to Senator CAIN, while he has been assigned to the committee by the Republican conference, he has not yet been formally elected by the Senate which, I assume, will be done today.

The CHAIRMAN. If he is not elected today, Senator KNOWLAND, please tell him that we would be delighted to have him sit with the committee, pending his confirmation, and so far as I am concerned, he could actually vote, although it would——

The CLERK. Voting in the affirmative are Mr. BRIDGES——

The CHAIRMAN. What is the total?

The CLERK. Five and five.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion having failed for want of a majority, there is nothing before the committee in reference thereto.

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to state that at the earliest opportunity when we have a full meeting of the committee, I shall renew my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator KNOWLAND, you are perfectly at liberty to do that.

In the meantime, the chairman, with the greatest affection and respect, and with no desire to short-circuit your intentions and desires, would like very much if you would explore this matter somewhat in a preliminary way with Secretary Matthews, and then, as a result of your exploration, you have some facts to present before us, you might pick up some support that in the present situation is not available.

In other words, if a prima facie case can be made out justifying some investigation as a result of your talk with Secretary Matthews, that would be one thing; but so far as I know we have not got anything to go on at all at the moment, excepting something that appeared in the paper.

Senator GURNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say this: I do want to get more information myself on the Navy and other departments of the Defense Establishment, not necessarily affecting the way I would vote on the nomination of Admiral Sherman.

I regret the decision of the committee this morning, for it has turned down the request of a member of the committee to have a witness come before the committee.

Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Chairman, I regret the action of the committee. I think it is the first time—certainly in 14 years—that it has happened, and it is a very regrettable thing.

I believe the chairman said that when Admiral Sherman was here before that we would have an opportunity to question Admiral Sherman before we voted. I would like to ask him some questions. May I ask when he will come?

The CHAIRMAN. Admiral Sherman? We have had him here. Do you want him back again?

Senator BRIDGES. When I asked the other day, you said we would have an opportunity to question him before we voted.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you want him back?

Senator BRIDGES. Yes.

Senator KEFAUVER. Mr. Chairman, I think no one wants to prevent Senator KNOWLAND or anyone else from going into any matters affecting Admiral Sherman, and I wonder if we would have the chairman plan to have Mr. Matthews come up at the same time that Admiral Sherman does, to ask him any questions.

The CHAIRMAN. I have no objection into inquiries into Admiral Sherman's fitness. I have no objection to an inquiry into Admiral Denfeld. All I want to do is not to get one done under the pretext that we are doing something else, that is all.

If the motion and intent, and my opinion, is to inquire into the removal of Admiral Denfeld, then we ought to be frank enough to say so and vote on it.

We ought not to do the inquiring under the pretext of inquiring into the fitness of Admiral Sherman.

Now, gentlemen, to end this on a pleasanter note, I have a communication from the Secretary of Defense.

(Discussion off the record.)

Senator BRIDGES. What date will we have Admiral Sherman up here?

The CHAIRMAN. Today is what, Thursday?

Senator BRIDGES. Any day except Monday would be all right.

Senator CHAPMAN. You said Thursday, the 19th, to vote on confirmation.

Senator KNOWLAND. I might say when we agreed to the 19th, you recall that Senator BYRD said he was perfectly willing for any other inquiry to go ahead, and it seems to me that they have changed the rules a little in the middle of the game.

The CHAIRMAN. He said to give you time to look into it, Senator.

Senator SALTONSTALL. I would like to make a motion while we have the full group here.

The CHAIRMAN. I am going to try to do it for Monday next.

Senator BRIDGES. Monday is the one day I cannot be here.

The CHAIRMAN. How about Tuesday?

Senator CHAPMAN. I will not be here. If you will vote by proxy, I am ready to vote on Admiral Sherman.

Senator BRIDGES. We will just ask him a few questions.

Senator CHAPMAN. All right.

The CHAIRMAN. Is Tuesday all right for everybody? Well, Tuesday at 10:30—let me change that to say that we will make it Tuesday sometime either in the morning or the afternoon.

Senator SALTONSTALL. I would like to make a motion to invite the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Matthews, to come before this committee in executive session to give the committee what information he desires concerning the Navy, its physical condition, its morale, and any other matters he may care to discuss with the committee.

I make that motion that he come at the earliest possible moment at a convenient time, mutually convenient to him and to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you allow me to interrupt you?

Senator SALTONSTALL. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman was going to, as soon as these nominations were out of the way, and after some preliminary contact with the Defense Department, ask the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force to come before us on three separate days, tell us what they had, what they did not have, and what they needed primarily, and give us the picture of all three services.

If you will allow me, Senator SALTONSTALL, I think your inquiry is right along that line, and I would like to arrange it all first tentatively, and then ask the committee when they wanted these gentlemen to appear, and to have the fullest attendance possible when we have these recitals, hear these recitals.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Now, I say, I make that motion, very frankly out here because I was very much disturbed by the vote on the other question.

The CHAIRMAN. So was I.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Regarding personalities and everything, and I hate to see this committee get into partisanship and personalities.

I cannot see—I say this in an open session, I know, but I asked for it in executive session—I cannot see why any member of this committee from my past experience of 5 years, can be refused to ask the Secretary of the Navy or any other secretary any questions that he thinks may be pertinent.

Now that necessarily may involve some of the questions that we have been previously discussing. Naturally it does in connection with the morale of the Navy.

That does not lead to any——

The CHAIRMAN. Senator SALTONSTALL, you are absolutely right on that. Nobody on this committee wants to stop any man from asking any questions. What we are doing here is asking whether the committee wants to investigate the Denfeld matter or whether it does not want to investigate it. That is all.

Senator SALTONSTALL. I say to you very frankly I do not want to investigate the Denfeld matter, so far as I know, on any information I have at the present time.

Now, you know and I know, Mr. Chairman, that there is no pertinency to questions or discussions, either on the floor or in committee—sometimes some of the questions seem so far from the point that it becomes very discouraging. There is no man who gets more discouraged than your good self, because I have seen you shift from one place to another and smoke unlighted cigarettes, and so on, as you are doing now. [Laughter.]

All I say is that it seems to me that we get off on a bit of a sidetrack and get involved in personalities and partisanship and everything else on what seems to me to be a perfectly reasonable request that, as we tie it up with a confirmation of a very high-type gentleman whom we expect to confirm for a very high-type office——

The CHAIRMAN. That is just what I want to prevent.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Now, Senator KNOWLAND is entitled to ask any questions that he wants in this room, rather than in his own office. I am interested in the answers, and you are interested in the answers, as a member of the Committee on Armed Services, and it seems to me that if we brush aside these sidetracks down which we have gone on a 5-to-5 vote, and say to ourselves, Mr. Matthews is coming before this committee sooner or later; he is coming in executive session; we are all entitled at that time to ask him questions.

The CHAIRMAN. Why should he come in an executive session? Why not in the open? What is there to hide?

Senator SALTONSTALL. There is nothing to hide, but I should suppose that the matters of the boilers of the Navy and the guns of the Navy, and the condition of its aircraft——

The CHAIRMAN. We are not going into that in this hearing, as I understand it.

Senator SALTONSTALL. When Mr. Matthews comes up here to discuss the physical conditions of the Navy, we are going to go into those questions.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean Friday?

Senator SALTONSTALL. I do not know when you will bring Mr. Matthews before us.

The CHAIRMAN. What did we just vote on here, Tuesday? If I understand it, Mr. Matthews is going to have to answer questions of that kind, and he will have to bring the big staff up here, because he will not be in a position to answer those questions.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Well, maybe I do not make myself clear. All I am trying to say is that any member of this committee, when Mr. Matthews comes, sooner or later, and he is bound to come before the session is over, and I hope in executive session, we can feel free to ask him any involved or detailed questions, questions that he can give the answers to in executive session, which answers he cannot give in open session.

All I am trying to do at this time is trying to face the realities, as I see them, and to eliminate this difficulty into which we may have gotten ourselves which, I feel, is most unfortunate.

The CHAIRMAN. It is unfortunate, I agree with you, and nobody regrets it more than the chairman. I think it probably will be blown up out of all proportions to what is involved.

The real question here is this: If the committee desires to go into the fitness of Admiral Sherman, all right. If the committee desires to go into the removal of Admiral Denfeld, all right.

But let us have a clear-cut understanding of what it is that the committee wants to do, that is all.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Is there not one more question?

Senator KEFAUVER. Mr. Chairman, just to get the thing behind us, why does not the chairman ask Mr. Matthews to come up with Admiral Sherman, to be on hand, if anybody wants to ask him any questions about Admiral Sherman's fitness or qualifications? He will then be here.

The CHAIRMAN. All right; we will do that.

Senator KEFAUVER. At the same time Admiral Sherman comes.

Senator CHAPMAN. At the time you invite the Secretary to come on those other days, we can go into all these things about Senator SALTONSTALL'S remarks about which he has spoken, the boilers and the physical condition of the Navy and everything else.

You do not mean to do that on Friday?

Senator SALTONSTALL. I would assume when Mr. Matthews was here and opened himself to questions on any questions, such as whether Admiral Sherman received a high-school education or not, that we would be entitled to ask him any questions we wanted to when that came up?

The CHAIRMAN. Sure.

Senator MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear you say that you intend to bring the Secretaries up here. I understand that includes the Secretary of Defense.

I want to say, and I am sure that the Senators from California, and I know the Senators from Washington, and my own colleague, agree that there is great concern all along the Pacific seaboard concerning our defenses, and a great fear has developed among our people in the West that we are not in a defensible position. At least, they want some assurance that we are, if we are, and they want some steps taken to correct the situation if we are not, Mr. Chairman.

We have had this very unfortunate rumor that has spread all over the West, which apparently came from some person within the Air Force, that the Air Force believed that Seattle, for example, was not defensible, even to the point of scaring the people into the thought that our defense plants, including the Boeing plants, would have to be moved inland.

Now, that is a shocking thing, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. I have seen some mail about it myself.

Senator MORSE. I want to announce now that when we have the Secretaries before us, including the Secretary of Defense, that I am going to pursue that matter in minute detail because I do not want to see the people of the west coast confronted with a terrific fear that has been stirred up out there just because somebody spoke out of turn down in the air branch of the services.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator MORSE, I am glad you brought that up. I wonder if the committee—I know the committee will—but I would like to put it this way—allow the chairman to take up this whole question of defense with the Military Establishment from top to bottom, and try to arrange a series of hearings or briefings or whatever they may be called, that will give us an overall picture of the whole show, some of which obviously will have to be done at the Pentagon, where they have the maps and data.

I have already done some work on it, but I hope that the committee will not find fault with the chairman in trying to arrange it as the facts that come to his attention seem best calculated to give the committee the information that it desires on the whole picture.

Senator MORSE. I appreciate what you will do in regard to that.

Senator KEFAUVER. Mr. Chairman, this meeting on next Tuesday with Admiral Sherman and Mr. Matthews on hand to answer any questions relative to his qualifications and what not, would that be an open meeting?

The CHAIRMAN. What will be the wishes of the committee?

Senator KEFAUVER. I think it ought to be.

Senator JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I think we are going to do and are doing the Navy a great injustice. I think we are doing Admiral Sherman a great injustice. I think we are doing the House committee a great injustice by coming in here and using Admiral Sherman's nomination to provide a forum each day on something that has no relationship to his fitness and his qualifications; and the thing I would like to do—I do not want to deprive any colleague of mine of asking any questions that he wants to ask on the subject pending before us; I do not know that I want to deprive him of a full-scale or full-dress investigation on this Denfeld matter. I think we ought to take one at a time.

The CHAIRMAN. That is right.

Senator JOHNSON. I wish the Chairman would find it possible at 2 o'clock this afternoon to bring the Secretary of the Navy and Admiral Sherman into this room and say, "We do not want this man," or "We do want this man."

We can confirm the head of the Munitions Board and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and everything else without any debate, but here is a man who has had a long and faithful record and each morning we come up here and debate it and make the headlines for another day, and I think we could get it all over with by bringing the Secretary up here and bringing the Admiral up here, and any member of the committee who wants to ask any questions concerning his qualifications or his fitness or anything else he wants to ask, do so, and if we think that using the nomination for some other purpose is being done, why, we can make our wishes known, and let the public judge at that time. Why do we not meet at 2 o'clock this afternoon and bring both of them in here?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator Johnson, I am reluctant to add anything to what you have said or prolong this discussion, but if I can be completely nonpartisan and objective solely for the interests of our country, I think unwittingly, and I know it is completely unwittingly and unintentionally, we are doing quite a disservice to Admiral Sherman and to the Navy in particular by pursuing the matter in the fashion that we are going about it.

Now, I have not the slightest objection to an inquiry into whether these officers are gagged or are not, or whether Denfeld should or should not have been removed, or whether he was treated fairly.

I have my own opinion about it, but I have no objection to having the facts brought out. But I do feel that in the pursuit of that we ought to keep that separate from whether or no Admiral Forrest Sherman, who has been nominated and has served for several months under very difficult circumstances, because he is in there under very great difficulties—we might as well face it—with some dissension down below him, I think the longer we postpone his confirmation the longer we do the cause of national defense immense and irreparable harm.

I would rather confirm him and have Senator KNOWLAND say he wants to go into the removal of Admiral Denfeld and the gagging of these officers, and put that proposition on the table, and I believe it would command a lot of support; but as for myself, in order to state it once again, I hate to see Admiral Sherman caught in-between these opposing forces, and the Navy and everybody and everything else suffer.

I am willing to go along with any investigation that the committee wants, but I would like to see Admiral Sherman exculpated.

Will 2 o'clock this afternoon suit you if I can arrange it? Shall it be open or executive? All right, it will be open and we will meet at 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 12:05 p. m., the committee adjourned to reconvene at 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day.)

(Afternoon session, 2:05 p. m.)

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, I wonder if you and Admiral Sherman would take seats side by side over there.

Gentlemen, in order to be perfectly fair, I do not know how long this hearing will last, but the chairman will be compelled to terminate it at 4 o'clock due to the fact that before he was obliged to call this meeting, he had made a previous engagement to be in Baltimore, and will have to recess it at that time.

Senator KNOWLAND, I would like you to know that in advance.

Senator KNOWLAND. If we have not finished, we can always take it up again.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what I wanted to say, that the meeting will have to be terminated at 4 o'clock.

While we are waiting, I would like to say that Senator CAIN, of Washington, has been nominated as a member of the Armed Services Committee; the Senate has acted upon that nomination, and we are very glad to have you, Senator.

Senator CAIN. Thank you, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. We know you have had quite extensive experience in the last World War, which is a fine qualification.

We are happy to have you here. We are all interested in promoting the defense of our country, and we are glad to have you helping us.

Senator CAIN. I am glad to be here.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is anything we can do to help you make your service on the committee pleasant, as well as to get you any information you would like to have, why, we will be very glad to try to get it for you.

Senator CAIN. I appreciate that very much.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we might proceed.

I would like to make a short statement, that we had quite a discussion this morning over a variety of subjects having to do with top personnel in the Navy Department.

Shortly before we recessed, it was proposed that we ask the Secretary and Admiral Sherman if they found it convenient to come before the committee at 2 o'clock this afternoon. I communicated immediately with the Secretary and Admiral Sherman, and am happy to have them here, and they were very willing and anxious to come if the committee wanted them.

The pending matter before us is the confirmation of Admiral Forrest Sherman to be the Chief of Naval Operations.

I would like to have you make any statement you care to make, Mr. Secretary, in regard to that matter.

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANCIS P. MATTHEWS, SECRETARY OF THE NAVY, ACCOMPANIED BY ADMIRAL FORREST P. SHERMAN, NOMINEE TO BE CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS, DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY

Secretary MATTHEWS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is a little bit difficult, under the circumstances, to know just where to start on that subject. I do not know just what is the question at issue.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, the question at issue, immediately at issue, is, at least, the qualifications of Admiral Sherman, in your judgment, to be Chief of Naval Operations.

We would like to have your opinion as to his qualifications to occupy one of the very most important posts in this whole Government, either civilian or military.

Secretary MATTHEWS. Well, I suppose that I probably could throw the best light on the question by reciting to the committee how it happened that I recommended him to the President for this post.

As the committee knows, I was before the committee in May on a question of my own nomination for the position of Secretary of the Navy, and I assumed the duties of that office on May 25 of this year.

When I took the office of the Secretary of the Navy, I came into it inexperienced in any technical knowledge of the affairs of the Navy, and at the time and under the circumstances that I assumed office, there were two live questions being discussed: One was the cancellation of the construction of the so-called supercarrier, that was a very live question; and another question which was a very live question was the question of unification.

I personally had no thorough knowledge of the unification or what it was, other than the average citizen would have who reads the newspapers and a lawyer might have because of his special interest in legislation.

I had never read the bill. I recognized that in assuming the office of Secretary of the Navy under the circumstances, that the question of unification was a very important one, and that it would be my duty to myself and to my office, to my country, to inform myself accurately on unification as best I could.

So I immediately started to study the question, and to that end I secured copies of the reports of the hearings on the Unification Act of 1947 from the committee in the House and the committee in the Senate and proceeded to start to read them and study them.

The first thing that challenged my attention was that Secretary Forrestal had appointed a man named Sherman to work with a man appointed by Secretary Patterson by the name of Norstad to draft the bill, the unification bill, and I pursued that subject and discovered that the bill which was finally introduced into Congress was substantially the bill which these two men had drafted.

Then by reason of the fact that Admiral Sherman was a naval officer I wanted to see what he thought about unification, and so the first thing I did was to read what he said in the record, the statements that he made and the testimony he offered and his answers to the various questions that were put to him, and I was impressed by the fact that he understood what unification was all about, he understood the implications from the standpoint of national defense, and he understood its application to the Navy, and it was evident that he was an accomplished naval officer.

So I thought to myself that this would be an opportunity for me to get a man who could help me very much in familiarizing myself with unification, and so I made inquiry about where Admiral Sherman was, and I found that he was in command of a task force in the Mediterranean, and then I made inquiry about him and discovered that some people did not like him, many people did like him, but I found that without exception everybody felt that he was an able officer, able naval officer, and that he was a man of obvious intellectuality, and so at that time I realized that by reason of his absence in the Mediterranean I would not have the privilege of conferring with him, and I continued in the performance of my duties.

Then in the course of time, as I inquired about Admiral Sherman, I found, as I say, that those who ought to know were of the opinion that he was a very able naval officer.

In the course of time—I do not know how much you want me to tell about this.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, we want just a summary of what your opinion of him is based upon, your own observation, and such other researches as you made as to his fitness for the post; at least, that is all I want.

Secretary MATTHEWS. From that inquiry and from what I learned at that time, I came to the conclusion that he was an able naval officer and ranked among the very top men.

The CHAIRMAN. Well, let me ask you, if during the time that he has been acting as Chief, have you had any occasion to alter your high opinion of him?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Not the slightest; in fact, my opinion of him has grown, has become better every day I have known him, and every day I have had an opportunity to observe him, especially since that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you consider him to be fully fitted in all particulars to discharge the very difficult duties of this post as well as to be a member of the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

Secretary MATTHEWS. I so think, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. You recommend his confirmation by the Senate?

Secretary MATTHEWS. I recommend his confirmation, and I recommended him to the President for appointment, and I certainly recommended him to the committee and to the Senate for confirmation.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman has finished asking questions, but he would like to accord full opportunity to the members of the committee, and if any member desires to ask a question he will simply indicate and I will be glad to recognize him.

Senator KNOWLAND?

Senator KNOWLAND. I have a few questions.

Mr. Secretary, what was the date upon which you became Secretary of the Navy?

Secretary MATTHEWS. May 25.

Senator KNOWLAND. May 25? My recollection is that on or about the 15th of August the former Chief of Naval Operations was confirmed by the Senate, and his name was sent up; is that approximately correct?

Secretary MATTHEWS. I would say about that time.

Senator KNOWLAND. You were Secretary of the Navy at the time?

Secretary MATTHEWS. I was Secretary; yes.

Senator KNOWLAND. How long is the term of Chief of Naval Operations?

Secretary MATTHEWS. The term for which Admiral Denfeld was appointed the first time was 2 years.

Senator KNOWLAND. Was the appointment on August 15, 1949, presumably for a 2-year term?

Secretary MATTHEWS. A second term of 2 years; yes, sir.

Senator KNOWLAND. A second term of 2 years.

Could you inform the committee as to how it happened that there is a vacancy in the office?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Well, at the present time the vacancy occurs by the fact that Admiral Denfeld's first term has expired and he never has been appointed for a second term. His name was suggested, he was confirmed, but the commission was never issued to him.

Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Secretary, I do not want to break in, but Admiral Denfeld never then was the Chief of Naval Operations——

Secretary MATTHEWS. For the second term.

Senator BRIDGES (continuing). For the second term?

Secretary MATTHEWS. No, sir.

Senator BRIDGES. The Senate confirmed him.

Secretary MATTHEWS. But that was, as I understand it—the confirmation was if the President wished to appoint him, but he never appointed him for the second term. He never issued the commission.

Senator BRIDGES. Well, is that not unusual? Is that not a situation, when his name was up here, Mr. Secretary, just to get the record straight—when we confirm an appointment, is that not over then?

Secretary MATTHEWS. No; not according to my understanding of it, Senator.

Senator BRIDGES. Well, it certainly is different from anything that I have ever heard before.

Secretary MATTHEWS. Do not ask me as a lawyer now; I am talking as Secretary of the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. You are just reciting or relating the facts that happened?

Secretary MATTHEWS. As they happened. You have to get a legal opinion on that yourself, but as a curbstone opinion, there is no appointment until the commission is issued. That is, the indication of the appointment—the way has to be cleared before the commission can be issued by a confirmation by the Senate, where nominations have to go through the Senate. In other words, the President could not, as I understand it, appoint a man to the office where his appointment has to be confirmed by the Senate unless that confirmation were given, but even if it is given, he still does not have to appoint him.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Well, the President changed his mind is what it amounted to.

Secretary MATTHEWS. That is right, and on my recommendation.

Senator SALTONSTALL. And Admiral Denfeld never held up his hand?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Never held up his hand; the commission was never issued to him, he never was sworn in.

Senator SALTONSTALL. And he changed his mind on your recommendation?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. So, the first term had expired, and he was not reappointed——

Secretary MATTHEWS. December 15.

The CHAIRMAN (continuing). For his second term?

Secretary MATTHEWS. This is a new term for which nobody has ever been appointed, except the interim appointment.

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Secretary, might I ask this question: His name was sent here on August 15 or thereabouts——

Secretary MATTHEWS. Yes, sir.

Senator KNOWLAND (continuing). August 11, and I think the Senate acted August 15, the same day the Senate confirmed.

On the date on which his name was sent to the Senate, did he have your approval for reappointment at that time?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Yes, sir.

Senator KNOWLAND. When, on what date, did you recommend that he not be sworn in?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Senator, I would have to refer to my record on that. I have not refreshed my recollection with those dates.

Senator KNOWLAND. Was that before or subsequent to the hearings before the committee of the House?

Secretary MATTHEWS. I would have to make two statements in that respect: The actual written recommendation was subsequent to the hearings.

Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Secretary, did you ever hear of another case or can you cite another case where the President of the United States has sent a name to the Senate of the United States for confirmation, the Senate of the United States has voted confirmation, and then you failed to issue his certificate of appointment or his commission?

The CHAIRMAN. Senator BRIDGES, if you will allow me, Mr. Secretary, because this throws some additional light on it, one of our staff has just called to my attention the fact that the term of Admiral Denfeld, his second term, would have begun on, I think, the 7th of December 1949, so that he would have had to start, his commission would have been issued, is what I am trying to say, dated as of December 7, 1949, because he would have been up to that time under his old appointment.

Secretary MATTHEWS. If that is the date of the expiration of the term.

Senator, I can answer your question by saying that, "No, I have never heard of such a thing," but that would not be significant or signify much because I dare say there has been such a case, but still I would have no occasion to know about it.

Senator BRIDGES. Senator KNOWLAND, go ahead. I want to ask a few questions after you are through.

Senator KNOWLAND. I wanted to complete this line of questioning.

Mr. Secretary, apparently your change in recommendation, then, of the Chief of Naval Operations, who had been recommended to the Senate and confirmed by the Senate, changed sometime between the 15th of August 1949, and the date on which normally he would have taken office which, you say, was brought about in your change of viewpoint, brought about as a result of the hearings before the House committee; is that correct?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Did you say that my opinion was brought about because of the hearings, the change of my opinion?

Senator KNOWLAND. I understood the change had taken place subsequent to that.

Secretary MATTHEWS. I did not say that the change of my opinion was due to the hearings; no, sir.

Now, I want to say this to the committee, if I may, that if you want to go into the question of my reasons for my changed opinion in regard to Admiral Denfeld, there are two requests I have to make.

I would want some time to go back and look over my records and refresh my recollection on dates that you mentioned, and then I would ask that out of deference to Admiral Denfeld it be a closed hearing.

Senator KNOWLAND. I am perfectly willing to drop my line of questioning at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that may be done.

Secretary MATTHEWS. I am perfectly willing to give you my innermost motives and everything that impelled me to do what I did, but I do want to do it properly.

Senator KNOWLAND. I think it is a perfectly reasonable request, and I am willing at this stage of the proceedings, providing the Secretary says he would be glad to come before us another time—that satisfies me on that particular point, and I will be glad to pursue that at some other time.

Secretary MATTHEWS. I will be glad to talk to you further.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we all agree that we all like Admiral Denfeld; he has a very distinguished career in the Navy, and regardless of this particular thing, none of us want to cast any aspersions on the fine record he has made, and whether he stays in the Navy or goes out, good luck to him.

Secretary MATTHEWS. And I least of all would wish to cast any aspersions on Admiral Denfeld.

Senator SALTONSTALL. Would you yield, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Senator SALTONSTALL. You take full responsibility for that change?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Absolutely, and I am totally responsible for it, yes, sir.

Senator KNOWLAND. Now, one other line of questioning, Mr. Secretary: Yesterday there was brought to my attention an article which is appearing in Collier's magazine of January 21, 1950, by Rear Adm. Daniel V. Gallery, United States Navy. Are you familiar with Admiral Gallery?

Secretary MATTHEWS. I have seen the article, yes.

Senator KNOWLAND. As I understand it, he is now Assistant Chief of Naval Operations for Guided Missiles?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Yes, that is correct.

Admiral SHERMAN. Yes, that is correct. There has been a change.

Senator KNOWLAND. Changed since when?

Admiral SHERMAN. He went to sea about the time that I came to Washington. He was deputy commander of the operational development force, Atlantic Fleet.

More recently, I assigned an admiral to investigate our status with respect to antisubmarine warfare, and he asked to have Admiral Gallery report there temporarily as assistant in the development of antisubmarine warfare. Admiral Gallery has had extensive experience in that respect, so that he now has a permanent station as deputy commander of the operational development force of the Atlantic Fleet, and is on temporary duty in my office.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like at this point to have the record show—and I think I was remiss in my duty in not calling this to the committee's attention before, but it slipped my mind—that during the recess I called up Congressman VINSON, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee of the House, and in a few sentences sort of briefed the discussion that we had had in this committee this morning, and told him that Secretary Matthews and Admiral Sherman were coming before us this afternoon, and that it might be pertinent to what we did here to know whether or not they intended to pursue the promises allegedly made to them against reprisals in further hearings, or to investigate further in reference to Admiral Denfeld, etc., covering the whole situation.

Mr. VINSON said that he—and he felt his committee—had all of the facts that entered into the matter in their possession now. They would shortly write their report and deal fully with that phase of the matter, and I then asked him pointedly, "Are you sure that the Denfeld matter will be fully dealt with in your report?" And he said, "It will."

So I think that puts a little different light on the situation as we contemplated it this morning, and I think I ought to have that in the record so that we all may know that the House intends to deal with this matter.

Senator KNOWLAND. Mr. Secretary, so far as you know, Admiral Gallery is a competent qualified naval officer?

Secretary MATTHEWS. So far as I know; yes, sir.

Senator KNOWLAND. In the article it states, and I read from page 16:

"Last October, on the date which was formerly Navy Day, Admiral Louis Denfeld, after 40 years of distinguished service to his country, in peace and war, was kicked out of his job as Chief of Naval Operations. The admiral learned of his firing from an aide who read about it in the newspapers. In the reshuffle which followed all the other top admirals who supported Denfeld were swept into the 'deep freeze'."

I will not pursue that article any further, but it goes on to say that—

"But I think that the implications of the purge are even more ominous to the country than they are to the Navy; the handwriting on the wall can now be plainly seen by military officers in the Army, Air Force, and Marine Corps, as well as the Navy. It says, 'Conform or be liquidated'."

Then it goes on and says—I have skipped some of it; I am not changing the context of the article, I believe:

"Under our form of government the basic decisions of military policy should be made by Congress. How can these decisions be made wisely if Congress is to be denied the honest advice of the men whom the taxpayers have trained to be their experts?"

Then, calling your attention to the Constitution of the United States, in article I, dealing with the powers of the Congress, that among the powers are those to raise and support armies but no appropriation of money for that use should be for a longer term than 2 years; to provide and maintain a navy, to make rules for the government and regulations of the land and naval forces, which clearly puts a considerable responsibility upon the Congress.

Would you give this committee your views, and I would like to ask Admiral Sherman later to give his views, as to the right of a congressional committee to interrogate witnesses to get their full, frank, and complete answers in executive session, if we are dealing with security matters or other matters which should be for the security of the country, whether you believe that there should be or has been any attempt to censor the views of officers, and in this particular case of the Navy, in giving those views before the Congress?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Senator, I am happy to have the opportunity to deal with that subject and to reveal to the members of the committee my thinking on the question.

Your question is a little bit involved. As I understand it, you are asking me what my opinion is about the right of a committee of Congress to question a member of the Military Establishment and require that individual to testify before a committee of the Congress.

Senator KNOWLAND. That is one question, yes.

Senator KEFAUVER. Mr. Chairman, may I interpose a thought here?

It would seem that the inquiry here would be about Mr. Matthews and I think we are going pretty far afield in getting into Mr. Matthews' views.

Secretary MATTHEWS. Senator, there have been a lot of things which have been said about me and my opinion, and I would like to have the opportunity myself so that I can be clearly understood.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you allow the Chair to interrupt a moment?

I am going to suggest to my able colleague, Senator KEFAUVER, that in this particular question we allow Mr. Matthews to answer it. I have not discussed this matter with him; I do not know what his answer is going to be, but I think we ought to have that question answered. I would like to ask everybody here, in a spirit of fair play, with which I try to meet the wishes that were in conflict this morning, to go into the qualifications of Admiral Sherman, that we do not get too far afield.

I am not going to object to this question or any similar questions, but I would like some cooperation, as the chairman is trying to accommodate both sides to this controversy.

Senator KNOWLAND. So that the issue may be clear, I believe that this is a pertinent question for this reason: There is now a vacancy in the Office of the Chief of Naval Operations; an appointment has come before the Senate of the United States; statements have been made by responsible naval officers that because of their views people have been punished for coming before a congressional committee.

I want not only the views of the Secretary of the Navy—and I think he may be able to clarify the statements which have appeared, but I also want the views of the new Chief of Naval Operations, because I think it is pertinent.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a different matter.

Senator KNOWLAND. But the new appointee is the personal recommendation, apparently, of the Secretary of the Navy. I think it is pertinent to the inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. We have not got the Secretary of the Navy on trial. We have got, in the best sense of that word, in the American tradition, Admiral Sherman here to give us his views on, and to justify his ability to hold, his job. Now, the question might be pertinent. I am not going to object to it. It might be pertinent if you would ask Admiral Sherman what his views are on that, but it seems to me to be a little far-fetched to ask the Secretary what his views are, because we not going to vote on the confirmation of the Secretary.

Secretary MATTHEWS. It might be a little bit late on that. If I were up for confirmation, that might be true.

The CHAIRMAN. Go ahead and ask it. Let us have a little latitude here, but I will ask all concerned if they will not cooperate so that we can end this nightmare.

Secretary MATTHEWS. Senator, I am just as convinced as you are that the congressional committees should have that right. The individual should have not only the right but the duty to testify, to be absolutely sure that he will not suffer any reprisal by doing so.

But I also think that when a member of the Military Establishment does that, that he must be prepared to, in a sense, take the consequences. By that, I do not mean that he should be punished, but I believe that in the Military Establishment you must have authority, there must be top authority and whoever is in authority is entitled to be supported by subordinates who are in accordance, in sympathy and belief in the policies of whoever is in authority.

If he is not in sympathy and not only is not in sympathy but if he denounces the policy of the highest authority in the Establishment, then he has not any business being in the chain of command where the one in command has to depend upon him to carry out his policies and his administration of the Department.

Now, that does not mean that he should be punished for saying that, but it would seem to me to be an utterly illogical position to require me, as Secretary of the Navy, to attempt to administer the Navy, particularly as a military establishment, and attempt to carry out my orders, my direction of the Navy through a man who is not only, as I say, not in sympathy with my policies and who openly denounces my policies, whether he does that before a congressional committee, on a public platform, or in a publication, and he must be ready to stand by his convictions.

Now, he should not be demoted. He should not be punished. But he should be transferred to a place where he can serve properly.

Senator KNOWLAND. Just let me understand that: As I get your answer—I do not want to do you an injustice on that situation, because I have not the facts—you say that you recognize the constitutional right of the Congress to have witnesses, from the Navy in your case, Navy personnel, and also personnel of the other armed services, to appear before the Armed Services Committee of the Senate or of the House, and that they are free, and you, in fact, encourage them to give their frank opinions in answer to inquiries, and so forth; but if in elucidating information they happen to disagree or to throw a different light upon it, then the policy laid down by yourself, as the Secretary of the Navy: They should be prepared to surrender their position in the chain of command and be moved to some other position.

Now, am I accurately stating your point of view?

Secretary MATTHEWS. If, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, that was necessary for the proper administration of the Navy; yes, sir.

Senator KNOWLAND. Well, then, they are all on notice here that if they do disagree, even if I or any other member of the committee asks a question, they are apt to be removed and sent, perhaps, to a less desirable or more distant post?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Whether you ask the question or not, that would be the case.

Senator KNOWLAND. Now, you apparently do not differentiate in your statement—and, again, I want to be perfectly fair about this—differentiate between a disagreement that might take place in a public magazine article of this kind or in a speech before some club, or in testimony before a committee of the Congress of the United States. You apparently group the three things together, and if a person in executive session responds to questions from a member of the committee and happens in doing that to state his honest opinion, which may differ with your opinion, that, therefore, he is on notice that he may be transferred?

Secretary MATTHEWS. It is not a matter, in my judgment, as to where he expresses that opinion. The important thing is that he entertains that conviction in opposition to his superior officer.

Senator KNOWLAND. Those are all the questions I have, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Before pursuing this investigation any further, Senator KNOWLAND, would you allow me to read this?

The question has been raised as to whether or not, when a person has been nominated and confirmed by the Senate, the President then has the right to withhold his commission, which is the instant case before us insofar as Admiral Denfeld is concerned.

In the very celebrated case of Marbury v. Madison, where this issue was raised and went all the way through the Supreme Court and is one of the key cases in American jurisprudence, the Supreme Court met the issue firmly, and it has been the law of the land from that good day to this.

In that matter the Court said:

"This is the last power conferred on the President by this clause"—referring to the clause in the Constitution—"the act of appointing to office and commissioning the person appointed cannot be considered as one and the same thing. The last act necessary to complete the commission is the signature of the President, and the signature which gives force and effect to the commission is conclusive evidence that the appointment is made. The President may withhold a commission from the appointee even after the appointment has been confirmed by the Senate."

That case arose, as many of you know, from a situation in my own State of Maryland. It is one of the key cases in American jurisprudence, and there is no law that I know of to the contrary, and even after the Senate confirmed Admiral Denfeld, before he was commissioned, the President has the right to withhold his commission if he so desires, and the Supreme Court says that is good constitutional law; so, I think we need to go no further into that any more.

Senator BRIDGES. Now, Mr. Secretary, I do not know as you realize your answer to Senator KNOWLAND's question, just exactly what the implications are that you throw out here.

What you are saying is, as I understand it, that if an officer of the United States Navy, an official of the United States Navy, comes before this—take away this committee—comes before the Appropriations Committee, and we press him on questions, and he gives us his honest answer, which happens to be different from the general policy laid down—he does not offer it of his own free will and accord, and he is asked by a Member of Congress, whose Members have the duty and the job under the Constitution of the United States, as far as the armed services are concerned—that he is subject to, in effect, reprisals of some kind? I do not think you want to say that; do you?

Secretary MATTHEWS. Not at all.

Senator BRIDGES. Is not that what you said to Senator Knowland?

Secretary MATTHEWS. No; that is not what I said at all. I said that when a subordinate in a military establishment differs from his superior that that superior is not compelled to retain him in that position even though he expresses that opinion before a congressional committee.

In other words, he cannot get, as I view it, and I do not see how you can maintain military command otherwise, as I understand it—just because a man has an opinion in opposition to his superior, because he expresses it before a congressional committee, that does not immunize him from what action the superior might take if he told the thing to the superior himself.

I think that he should not be subject to reprisal, and so far as I know I do not know of any instance where anybody has, and I would be the last one to favor reprisal, and I can assure you that this situation in the Navy is a situation where nobody has been subject to reprisal.

Senator BRIDGES. Now, just leaving the past entirely, and looking into the future, so that you are not in a position of defending or justifying any position which you or anybody else has taken, let us look to the future.

If I, as a Senator of the United States, and a member of this committee, or a member of the Appropriations Committee, in which capacity so and so or Admiral So-and-So is testifying before that committee, and he presents the case of the department, or his division of the department, in line with the policy, and then I say to him, "Now, let us look into this a little," and we press him, and I know of several cases, particularly in the Appropriations Committee, where things have come out in that manner, which certainly have been very helpful for the national defense, suppose we press it, how can I, as a member of the Armed Services Committee, or the Appropriations Committee, legislate intelligently if I cannot go to the bottom and get the honest conviction of the man or the men we train as our experts, and they cannot feel that they can talk freely without the thought that they are going to be censured or removed from their posts and shifted elsewhere?

Now, I say, that is wholly different from writing an article for a magazine or making a speech, or something like that. I mean, where he is testifying before a committee. Leave the past, let the past be the past, but just think of future cases.

Secretary MATTHEWS. Well, as I understand it, Senator, the problem that you had in mind is whether or not because the man testifies before the committee, then he will be subject to reprisal or punishment for doing that. Of course, he should not be, and he would not be.

Senator BRIDGES. Well, then, for instance, here is a man, here is a captain——

Secretary MATTHEWS. I would stand for that policy just as zealously as any member of this committee or any Member of the Congress. You could not do your work otherwise until you are free to ask the people who know. You have to depend upon them to get the information, that is obvious.

Senator BRIDGES. I may have got all wrong the way you answered Senator KNOWLAND, but I thought that if this man differed from his superior in the answers he gave, then you would say that it would be for the best interests of the service that he be transferred to some other post.

Secretary MATTHEWS. No; I did not say that. That would depend upon the situation; and the fact that he testified before the committee would have nothing to do with it at all. It would be the convictions that he held, and he might never testify. He might have those same convictions.

Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Secretary, you might never know those convictions unless he did testify.

The CHAIRMAN. Senator BRIDGES, you certainly are not advocating that a man who has strong convictions should keep them to himself because he was afraid that he would be transferred to some other post if he thinks his country's welfare is at stake?

Any man in the service who would not come up and have his say, no matter what the consequences were, if he thought that his country was being sold down the river, would not be worth his salt. He may be wrong.

The question here is not that, as I understand the question. The question is if you have a settled policy in a department, if you are not entitled to have men under you who are in harmony with trying to make that policy work. That is all there is to this.

Senator BRIDGES. I agree with that.

The CHAIRMAN. Which is an entirely different thing from what we have before us here.

Senator BRIDGES. I agree with what you have said there, but I also say that if the day comes when a committee of the Congress of the United States cannot call a member of the armed services up here and question him and have him state his convictions, whether they are contrary to the policy of the Department or anything else, it is a sad day for America.

The CHAIRMAN. Even Members of Congress sometimes do not give their convictions, because they are afraid they will be recalled from their posts by those who have the right of recall latent in the ballot box. I have seen some of those during my lifetime. That is just a human equation. Can't we dispense with this? Senator KNOWLAND has got the answers that he wants at this stage of the proceeding, at least, and the Chair does not want to go into this morning's controversy.

Here we have got Admiral Sherman before us. It looks to me as if good sportsmanship ought to prevail here. We are all good Americans, we all love the Navy. We all want to see it getting ahead under a full head of steam, and would it not be a fine thing, if there is no objection, to Admiral Sherman, if we could confirm him and let him go back to work instead of running him up here every day or every 2 days to testify before the committee?

Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask Admiral Sherman a question or two.

Secretary MATTHEWS. May I say that I think we, who have these executive positions, are entitled to be credited with good faith and good intentions, just as Members of Congress are. We are all serving the Government as best we can, and I hope that I am actuated by the same good motives which actuate the members of this committee, and in the performance of such duties as are entrusted to me, I have done that, and I have meticulously striven to avoid anything in this proceeding that would in any way reflect upon Admiral Denfeld, for whom no member of this committee has any higher regard than I have, and I think I have his friendship, as well as his having mine.

Senator BRIDGES. Mr. Secretary, you understand that the questions I was addressing to you have not particularly to do with that.

Secretary MATTHEWS. I know that.

Senator BRIDGES. I am dealing with the whole broad question, whether it is the Secretary of the Air Force or the Secretary of the Army or anybody else or you; it is the whole broad question.

Secretary MATTHEWS. I understand that. I think it is a fundamental question.

The CHAIRMAN. I think Admiral Sherman ought to be allowed to participate in this tête-à-tête. He is the culprit or the hero. I do not know which he is, and we have got him before us, and I would like to ask whether there are any members of the committee who want to ask Admiral Sherman any questions.

Senator BRIDGES. I would like to ask Admiral Sherman one.

When you were offered the post of Chief of Naval Operations, with the offer did there go any request of you or any commitment from you as to the policies that you would pursue or what you would do or were you given a free hand?

Admiral SHERMAN. I was given a completely free hand. There were no commitments or promises whatsoever.

Senator BRIDGES. To anyone?

Admiral SHERMAN. To anyone. I was not asked for any; and I would like to correct the phrase "offered me the post."

I was quite happy where I was. When I first came back I was asked if I would come back here and serve; I said that I would serve as second under Admiral Nimitz or any other chief, and I did not seek the position, and I was not asked to make any commitments or promises when it was given to me.

Senator BRIDGES. And such talk as you may have had with the Secretary of the Navy or with the President of the United States, or such general conversation, those conversations were not to define for you what your duties were to be or what your policies should be, with the concurrence from you; they were general talks, and you were entirely free to, you assume yourself, that you were entirely free and that you were to be entirely free——

Admiral SHERMAN. As a matter of fact, the assignment was made to me that I would not be asked any questions, because my views on the unification and the policy of the national defense organization were known.

Senator BRIDGES. Admiral Sherman, I would like to ask you another question: You have taken over the job of Acting Chief of Naval Operations, and if you are confirmed by the Senate you will be Chief of Naval Operations.

What would be your personal attitude as Chief of Naval Operations relative to one of your subordinate officers testifying before a congressional committee in the future—we will disregard the past, and look entirely into the future—now before this committee or any other committee, if as a result of questioning by a congressional Member, that man gave his convictions, honest convictions, which differed from yours, or from the policy of the department head, perhaps, under which you worked?

Admiral SHERMAN. I would expect any officer who testifies before a congressional committee to present the views of the department and identify them as such, as then when asked for his own views in questioning he should give his own views, with one exception, that when he gives his own views, which are not those of the department he represents, he should make that distinction known. In other words, he comes up here to ask for an appropriation of a certain amount, and if he is asked if he can use more money, he should certainly give the answer correctly, but he should not leave the impression that his own views are those of the department, if they happen not to be.

Senator BRIDGES. And as Chief of Naval Operations, if he did that, would you in any way with respect to the word "reprisal" or "discipline"—would you take any act to discipline him or take reprisals against him?

Admiral SHERMAN. No, indeed.

Senator BRIDGES. Would you also go so far as to say that not only would you not discipline him but you would protect a man in those rights?

Admiral SHERMAN. I certainly would.

I was always protected when I appeared as a witness before congressional committees in the past, and I certainly would expect to do everything in my power to protect any officer who testified honestly and fearlessly before a committee of the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, gentlemen, I would like to get the attention for a moment of Senator KNOWLAND—without cutting off the probability of any collateral inquiry; Senator KNOWLAND, do you feel that the thing has gone far enough, that you would be satisfied for us to vote on Admiral Sherman now or would you still like to hold it up a while longer?

Senator KNOWLAND. I would say that based upon the answers that Admiral Sherman has given to this committee, and upon his standing as a naval officer and his excellent record, I am personally prepared to vote for his confirmation.

The CHAIRMAN. That is very nice. I hope somebody will make a motion.

Senator CHAPMAN. I move that he be confirmed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there a second to it?

Senator KEFAUVER. I will second it.

Senator GURNEY. I will second it.

Senator SALTONSTALL. May I ask Mr. Matthews one question, which I hope is for the purpose of clearing the record with respect to what he has said?

You have stated, Mr. Secretary, that you took full responsibility for not recommending to the President that he sign Admiral Denfeld's commission. You have stated also your policy with relation to officers, and their testimony, and so on.

You have also testified by inference, as I listened to you, that your recommendation to the President with relation to Admiral Denfeld was not in any way connected with the congressional hearings.

Now, Admiral Denfeld is a Massachusetts citizen. You have stated that you have a great deal of friendship for him; so have I. I assume from what you have said that your failure to recommend that the President sign his commission was in no derogation to Admiral Denfeld in any shape, way, form, or manner, except that he may have differed in policy from your conception of the policy of conducting the Department; is that correct?

Secretary MATTHEWS. That is it; yes, sir.

Senator SALTONSTALL. For that reason you did not make the recommendation to the President?

Secretary MATTHEWS. That is right; yes, sir.

Senator SALTONSTALL. And there is no evidence of any kind of derogation with respect to Admiral Denfeld in any way, shape, form, or manner?

Secretary MATTHEWS. I felt I could not administer the Navy with Admiral Denfeld as Chief of Naval Operations. I did not in any way discount his qualities or qualifications.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you both for coming up, and I would now like to propose that the question be voted on.

It has been regularly moved and seconded that the nomination of Admiral Forrest P. Sherman to be Chief of Naval Operations be reported favorably to the Senate, with a prayer that it be speedily confirmed.

All those in favor signify by saying "aye."

(There was a chorus of "ayes.")

The CHAIRMAN. Those opposed, "no."

(There was no response.)

The CHAIRMAN. It is unanimous. Thank you, Admiral; thank you, Mr. Secretary.

(Whereupon, at 2:55 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned.)

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. In order to comply with the ruling of the President of the Senate, I should like to ask the Senator, if the chairman of the Armed Services Committee obtains a chronological account of what really happened, from the documents and other data, necessary to sustain the chronological account, and if that is accompanied by any order, or otherwise, that might throw light on it, the Senator does not think we should get that and call it to the attention of the Senate before either the Armed Services Committee of the Senate considers this matter further, because then we shall be in a position to have a chronological and factual account as well of all the steps leading up to the matter which is now before the Senate.

Mr. McCARTHY. The Senator's question is, Do I think we should withhold the confirmation of Sherman until we have all the facts? Absolutely yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I asked the Senator if the chairman of the Armed Services Committee produced a chronological record of all the steps leading up to what is now before the Senate and open to discussion and it is put in the RECORD and the Senate advised of it, does the Senator not think that should be done first and we should ascertain the facts before we proceed further with the consideration of this matter so that we shall have the facts before us rather than suppositions upon which to argue?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me first answer the question of the Senator from Maryland. I say absolutely yes; the Senate should not take any action upon Admiral Sherman's appointment today. There should be no vote upon it until the Armed Services Committee has obtained all the facts. There is no question about that. I frankly would not be in a position to vote on his confirmation today. If the Senate were to call up Sherman's nomination, I could not vote against the man. I think he is extremely competent. I could not vote for him because it now appears from Matthews' own testimony that we already have one Chief of Naval Operations. All I could do when called upon to vote would be to answer "present." I assume many other Senators are in the same position, so I heartily agree that we are not in a position today to pass on the confirmation of Admiral Sherman.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Does not the Senator from Wisconsin think that the proper place to develop the chronological order is in the standing committee of the Senate which is charged under the law with responsibility for the armed services, and if Secretary Matthews comes before the committee and presents that, he will then be subject to such examination as the committee members might care to put him through, so that we can develop all the facts. The committee of the Senate is the proper place for these facts to be developed, particularly in view of the apparent discrepancy in the testimony which was given at our last meeting.

Mr. McCARTHY. I agree with the Senator 100 percent. I assume that was what the Senator from Maryland had in mind. I assumed he was referring to an investigation by the Armed Services Committee, and not to a review by some individual. I may say also that I hope the committee will see fit to invite the Senator from Wisconsin to sit in at the time the committee conducts the investigation.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I should be happy to make such a request on behalf of the Senator from Wisconsin, but unhappily I have to be away from the Senate for the remainder of the week.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I do not like unnecessarily to take up the time of the Senate. I have a number of remarks which I was prepared to make, but most of them have been made in answers to questions. For that reason I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of my remarks be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the remainder fo Mr. McCARTHY's remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There can be no other interpretation of this, because surely we are not expected to believe that the day-to-day transactions of Government agencies are of such a character as to throw our national existence into jeopardy.

The only meaning that this order can possibly have—the real truth about it—is that the bureaucrats wanted to be free forever from the prying eyes of the press and the people, and free from congressional suspicion.

Somehow, Mr. Truman managed—even before his censorship code went into effect—to draw the curtain of secrecy around the very creation of this censorship code. To this day the order might be a secret had not an alert reporter in October 1947 accidentally overheard a conversation about the order. The story then exploded in the press. And what was President Truman's explanation? There was none. The President merely said, in writing, that he had never heard of the program.

An investigation of the matter was commenced in March 1948 by the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. This investigation showed clearly what was going on. The important question, of course, is, Did this congressional investigation put a stop to the President's over-all censorship order? No one knows.

We do know that the Secretary of the Security Board told the House committee that action on the regulations would be suspended until the investigation was completed. The investigation was completed long ago, but dead silence has fallen ever since on the subject of the secrecy code. Whether or not the secrecy code is in effect today, I do not know, but I strongly suspect that it is. In fact, there is every reason to believe that it is in effect today.

Let me cite an example of how this all-encompassing censorship code works—an incident which occurred after the congressional investigation was completed.

Six months ago, in July of 1949, reporters of the Washington Times-Herald tried to attend a conference being held in one of the Cabinet departments The press has always attended such conferences. The subject of the conference was of vital concern to the public. The reporters, however, were refused admittance.

At the close of the conference the department's director of information told the reporters no details would be released, and he added—which I think is the crux of this whole story—this comment: "Like all Government business, this is being handled in private, and the decision will be announced later."

The American people, in other words, were not to know about their own business.

This, of course, is only one example of how the secrecy system has been applied to civilian agencies. The most thorough, the tightest, the most efficient job, however, has been done by the Department of Defense.

What does all this mean? It means that the administration clearly feels that it has a perfect right to operate on a stage that has been fixed so that none but the privileged can look on. On the other side of this curtain of secrecy are the American people, the American press, and the Congress.

I submit, Mr. President, that the high-handed methods being used in the Defense Establishment are completely contradictory of our alleged high aims and purposes. I submit that this entire picture involves not only the Secretary of the Navy, but his own responsible superior, the Secretary of Defense, who is charged by the unification law with specific responsibility for the administration of the affairs of the three armed services.

It's Secretary Matthews' blunder if he does not know whether there is or there is not a vacancy in the office of Chief of Naval Operations. Why, in God's name, doesn't the Secretary of Defense know what he is doing? Why does he allow such incompetence in one of his important divisions? Is it possible that he concurred in this reprisal? Is it possible that he, too, was a party to the ignominious manner in which the Chief of Naval Operations was removed? Is it possible that he believes and concurs in this autocracy? The country is entitled to know just who is responsible for the debacle in which we find ourselves.

I submit also that the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief, has become involved. For while he cannot watch every detail of operation, he must know by now that there are blunderers in the defense establishment who are weakening confidence in that establishment throughout the country and demoralizing our armed services. His is a responsibility that should rise above political party and personal favor.

Mr. President, the questions which I have outlined involve no partisanship. Men who served in the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force knew no party. And when they go to war they know only one loyalty. But precisely because they are asked to give their lives for their country in time of war, they must not be required to sacrifice their consciences in time of peace.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. WITHERS. I should like to ask the Senator whether the question of delivery would be involved in the issue of a commission.

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps.

Mr. WITHERS. That being true, the Senator has not made out any case on issue at all. Delivery must be proved. The Senator has charged a witness with falsifying, but he has not shown that there was ever proper delivery of the commission.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not interested in making out a case for or against anyone. I am merely presenting facts to the Senate. The original commission is in the possession of Admiral Denfeld. While in his possession these photostatic copies were made and sent to me.

Mr. WITHERS. Is that even prima facie evidence of delivery?

Mr. McCARTHY. I am not concerned with that question.

Mr. WITHERS. I may want to ask the Senator this question——

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me complete my answer to the Senator's question. I am not concerned with making out a case. I come before the Senate and state the facts which I have discovered. Apparently, both the Republican and Democratic members of the Armed Services Committee are agreed that in view of these facts they will not bring up the question of confirmation of the nomination at this time. We want to find out why Matthews lied before the committee. I am not making out a case; I am only giving the Senate the facts, which seem to be that we now have a Chief of Naval Operations, and that before we attempt to confirm the nomination of a second man to that position, let us ascertain whether the office is vacant.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator did say that the Secretary had made a false or an incorrect statement before the committee. If there had been no delivery of the commission there was no issue of it. It takes delivery, if I properly understand the Senator, to complete the issue of the commission. Am I correct?

Mr. McCARTHY. No; the Senator is completely incorrect.

I refer to page 125 of the hearings. Nothing was said about delivery.

Mr. WITHERS. Let me ask the Senator if he did not say that delivery was part of the issue.

Mr. McCARTHY. Let me call the Senator's attention to page 125 of the transcript, a question by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL]:

> You have stated, Mr. Secretary, that you took full responsibility for not recommending to the President that he sign Admiral Denfeld's commission.

There is more of that question, but Mr. Matthews said:

> That is it; yes, sir.

Matthews said the commission was never signed. I again refer to page 95 of the transcript of the hearing:

> Secretary MATTHEWS. But that was, as I understand it—the confirmation was if the President wished to appoint him, but he never appointed him for the second term. He never issued the commission.

Admiral Denfeld has the commission in his possession. If there is some other definition of "delivery," I frankly do not know what it is. Admiral Denfeld has the commission which was issued and signed by President Truman and Mr. Matthews. I cannot tell the Senator any more.

Mr. WITHERS. Would it not have been easy to ascertain whether there had been an actual delivery?

Mr. McCARTHY. I just said to the Senator that if he had some other definition of delivery, then, in heaven's name, give it. I have stated that the commission of which I have a photostatic copy was given to Admiral Denfeld—or delivered, if the Senator prefers. It was signed by the President and by Matthews. That is my definition of "delivery." I have practiced law for a long time, and I have been on the bench. So far as I know, that would constitute a complete legal delivery.

Mr. WITHERS. Did the Senator say that he did not know how he obtained possession of it, or whether he had possession of it? Did not the Senator say that before the Senate?

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not know how he obtained possession of it; that is true. I have not asked him that question.

Mr. WITHERS. Then, has the Senator established a prima facie case of issue?

Mr. McCARTHY. I have established a prima facie case of either incompetence or deliberate lying.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask the Senator——

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate unnecessarily. I have given the facts as I have them. I say I do not know how Admiral Denfeld got the commission. I do not know who delivered it to him. I do know that it is in his possession. I have here a certified photostatic copy of it. Whether it was delivered in such a way that the Senator would say it was a legal delivery, I frankly do not know. I have neither the facilities nor the time to conduct an investigation, which I am sure the Armed Services Committee will conduct. If it should develop that there was no legal delivery, then, perhaps, Denfeld is not the Chief of Naval Operations today. I do not know. I do know that Matthews says the commission was never signed. He was either lying or he did not know what he was doing when he signed it.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to precede the question I am going to ask by a short observation, without the Senator from Wisconsin losing the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the case of Myers against United States, decided by the Supreme Court in 1926 and reported in two hundred and seventy-second United States Reports. The facts of the case were that in Portland, Oreg., a postmaster had been appointed for a term of 4 years, and prior to the expiration of his term he was removed from office by order of the President and the Postmaster General. He petitioned Congress and the courts for reinstatement, and also sued for the balance of his salary of his unexpired term.

The Court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Taft, in a very lengthy opinion, in which all the authorities were cited, held that the vesting of the power in the President, as the chief executive officer, gave him the right to remove an officer, even though he might be appointed for a term, before the expiration of that term. I quote two sentences from the opinion of the Court, on page 161:

> The power to remove inferior executive officers, like that to remove superior executive officers, is an incident of the power to appoint them, and is in its nature an executive power. The authority of Congress given by the excepting clause to vest the appointment of such inferior officers in the heads of departments carries with it authority incidentally to invest the heads of departments with power to remove.

The whole matter is discussed in a great many cases along that line.

So, even assuming that Admiral Denfeld had held up his hand and had taken the oath of office, under this Myers case I cannot see how there can be much question about the power of the President to remove him, even if he had been serving, during his term.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. Just a moment, until I reply to the Senator from Tennessee.

I am afraid the Senator has misunderstood the issue I have been discussing. I do not believe there would be any question about the removal of Admiral Denfeld. If the President said, "Admiral, we want you to resign," I am sure, knowing the type of man Denfeld is, that he would sign his resignation tomorrow. The point is that as of today we do not know the facts. There is no way for this body to know whether or not there is presently a Chief of Naval Operations. In other words, we do not know whether or not there is a vacancy. We know that the Armed Services Committee assumed there was a vacancy, an assumption which they were justified in taking, basing it on the erroneous information given to them by Matthews. When the Senator from California asked Matthews, "How does it happen that there is a vacancy?" he said, "There is a vacancy because a commission was never signed." We can assume that his thought was that, had the commission been issued, there would not have been a vacancy. It is the task of the Armed Services Committee to investigate that matter both from the factual standpoint and from the legal standpoint. The Senator from Maryland has told us that that will be done. The Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] says that he believes very strongly that that should be done. I think all the members of the Armed Services Committee who are present have agreed that the task of the Armed Services Committee is to take the information which they now have and then come back to the Senate and say, "These are the facts."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator from Maryland just went to the telephone and tried to reach Secretary Matthews, but he was advised that the Secretary was in Omaha. The Senator from Maryland, in order to expedite the business that is before the Senate, then went to other sources in the Defense Establishment, and in a brief manner recounted what had taken place on the floor of the Senate this afternoon in regard to the confirmation of Admiral Sherman, and the points that are incident and related to a consideration of that matter.

The Senator from Maryland has asked for a chronological account of the steps leading up to the appointment of Admiral Sherman insofar as they deal with Admiral Denfeld. The Senator from Maryland has likewise asked for copies, or the originals—whichever is more convenient—of any written orders having to do with the subject.

The Senator from Maryland has also pointed out that a commission has been exhibited here on the floor of the Senate, which puts the testimony of Secretary Matthews somewhat in question. We do not know what the real facts are. It may be, perhaps, that the commission was issued and the admiral was never sworn, as required by law. Whether or not, in the absence of that compliance with the requirement, the position would be vacant, according to the decisions, or whether it could still be filled, we do not know. In any event, I have asked that all the circumstances surrounding the appointment of Admiral Sherman, based on whether there is a vacancy, be put in the hands of the Armed Services Committee, so that the Senate may have all the facts when they determine to proceed with this matter again. All that information will be forthcoming.

I believe, however, that if we find that there has been an order by the President, regardless of whether it was right or wrong, or what the merits or demerits might have been, removing Admiral Denfeld, whether he had been commissioned and sworn, or whether he had been commissioned without being sworn, or whether he had not been commissioned, there is a vacancy.

If that assumption is correct, there are two possible avenues of inquiry. If we establish, first, that there is a vacancy and that Admiral Sherman is qualified for the position, and that the vacancy was legally created, then our duty is to vote for or against Admiral Sherman. The other horn of the dilemma is whether or not the Committee on Armed Services wishes to go into the manner in which Admiral Denfeld was removed. That has nothing to do, primarily, with the Sherman nomination, assuming there is a vacancy in the office.

If the committee wishes to go into the Denfeld matter, the proper way to bring that up is to offer a resolution in the Senate and have it go to the Armed Services Committee of the Senate, and have that committee vote either for or against an investigation of that character. The point the chairman of the Armed Services Committee makes is that he does not think that in a matter of this importance we should proceed informally, but should proceed in the regular way.

Inasmuch as the committee itself and the arguments of the able Senator from Wisconsin are bottomed on the point that the removal or the holding of office ought to be accomplished in an orthodox and legal way, it is incumbent upon the Senate to proceed in an equally orthodox and legal way. All the information requested by the Senator from Wisconsin will be gotten as soon as possible, and the Senator from Maryland will charge himself with spreading it on the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. After we have the facts, the Senate can determine in what field it may wish to investigate and what further it may wish to do in this matter.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin to yield at that point, because the discussion deals with the Armed Services Committee, and I ask that the Senator may not lose his right to the floor.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, may I have unanimous consent that I will not lose the floor by yielding to the Senator from California to answer the Senator from Maryland?

The PRESIDING OFFICE (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). The Senator asks unanimous consent. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the consent is granted. The Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I wish to say to the able Senator from Maryland that I do not quite agree with him on the procedure he has suggested, as to whether a formal inquiry is necessary or desirable in the Denfeld matter. In view of the understanding in the Armed Services Committee, when the Senator from California agreed not to press the questions, in view of the prior answer by the Secretary of the Navy to questions regarding the Denfeld matter in open meeting, the Secretary agreed that he would be glad to come before the committee in executive session, where the full facts might be developed.

Under those circumstances, and in view of the new evidence which has been produced today—and there may be some logical explanation as to how the Secretary was misunderstood—it seems to me that the correct procedure would be to have a meeting of the Armed Services Committee in executive session, as the Secretary indicated there were some matters he wished to present in executive session, so that the members of the committee could satisfy themselves as to whether or not this testimony which the Secretary gave was the result of a misunderstanding, or whether there were other facts with which he had not familiarized himself.

I regretfully suggest that if the Senator will follow that suggestion, we may be able to expedite this whole matter of the Sherman nomination, which I personally do not want to see held up, because I think Admiral Sherman is a very able officer.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not believe the Senator from California and I are very far apart in this matter. The position of the Senator from Maryland is, briefly, that if it is established to the satisfaction of the Senator from California and other members of the Armed Services Committee, and the Members of the Senate, that a vacancy actually existed, and that Admiral Sherman was nominated to fill the vacancy, we should act upon the fitness of Admiral Sherman to fill the vacancy. If facts and information in connection with this whole incident, as to the way in which Admiral Denfeld was removed, or any other factors relating to the creation of the vacancy for which Admiral Sherman has been nominated, develop, that would be a very proper subject of inquiry for the committee. If there is established the fact that a vacancy was created in a purely orthodox manner and existed at the time Admiral Sherman was nominated to fill this position, it seems to me the President is within his rights in filling the vacancy, and the sole question before us, insofar as that phase is concerned, is whether or not we should confirm or not confirm Admiral Sherman's nomination.

That would not preclude the committee or the Senate or the Congress from conducting any investigation it cared to make into the Denfeld matter, and all the steps that led up to his removal. But I respectfully submit that if the vacancy exists in the office of the Chief of Naval Operations, and if that vacancy is a purely legal one in all its ramifications and manifestations, then the question before the Senate is, Is the nominee who has been named to fill a legally existing vacancy an able and efficient and fit man to occupy that post?

In conclusion, let me say to the Senator from California that in making these two distinctions I do so with no idea of shutting off any investigation the committee may desire to make in reference to the Denfeld matter. But I do not think Admiral Sherman should be penalized nor the Department left without a head while we conduct an investigation into other circumstances than the vacancy itself, which might conceivably last over a period of months, and serve no good purpose at all, and in the meantime leave the Navy Department without a confirmed head, and the prestige and morale which goes with confirmation, to conduct the Department during this critical period of its affairs.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I want to say most respectfully to the Senator from Maryland, the Chairman of the Armed Services Committee, that, as the Senator will remember, the committee originally agreed that the nomination of Admiral Sherman would not be voted upon until Thursday, January 19. However, based on the testimony which was given to the committee, whatever the date of the hearing was, the testimony of the Secretary that no commission had been issued, and in fact that there was a vacancy, immediately an entirely changed aspect was given to the hearings, and as the Senator quite remembers——

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Let me finish my statement.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator has made a misstatement, and I know he does not want to make it. The Senator from California asked that 10 days or a couple of weeks, or some part of that time, be given to him to make an inquiry into this matter, and the committee acceded to the wishes of the Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. It was not agreed that there would not be a vote until the 19th, but when the Secretary testified, the Senator from California then said that he was satisfied to proceed immediately.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Based on the——

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want the Senator to be under the impression that we broke an agreement. We simply were released from a tentative agreement by the Senator who made the request.

Mr. KNOWLAND. The Senator is absolutely correct. The Senator from California released that agreement based on the testimony before the committee of Secretary Matthews and Admiral Sherman.

I raise no question of the testimony given before the committee by Admiral Sherman. But I believe, in view of the fact that I had released the committee from the agreement to vote on the 19th, that we are entitled now to have Secretary Matthews clear up this point which he may be able to do in an hour's meeting one morning either tomorrow or the next day, whenever he might be available to us. I think, as a member of the committee—and I am sure from listening to other members who were here and have now left the Chamber—that it would be the desire of all of us, in fairness to Secretary Matthews and in fairness to the committee, that he should promptly come before the committee and clarify the point which has been raised.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am going to release my part of the time after making this final statement. The Senator from Maryland is as anxious as is the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from California to bring all phases of the matter before the Senate before he requests any further action upon the confirmation of Admiral Sherman. He has asked for information. He has tried to ask for it as comprehensively as the debate would indicate the Senate desires it to be, and he will make no move of any kind whatsoever until that information is at hand, until it is spread upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and Members have had time enough to say what they think is best to do from that point on. He has asked for all phases of it so far as he is able to imagine what would be requested, so that nobody will be in the dark when the time comes either to investigate further or confirm, or do whatever is essential.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I may say that I, for one, think Admiral Sherman will be an excellent Chief of Naval Operations, when he becomes Chief. How long Admiral Sherman will last we do not know. Unless Matthews changes his attitude, probably Sherman will not last any longer than Denfeld did.

Mr. President, in fairness to the Senator from Maryland, I believe I should repeat a statement I made when the Senator was not present. Before the Senator left the floor earlier in the afternoon, I understood him to say that he felt it was not the function of the Senate Armed Services Committee to investigate a matter which I think is infinitely more important than the question of whether there is a vacancy today. The question which I think is of vast importance is whether or not deliberate steps are being taken in the Pentagon to make it impossible for the officers of the military forces freely and honestly to tell the proper congressional committees what they think should be done and what they think should not be done. Whether that is correct or not, many of us do not know. We do know that outstanding naval officers, such as Admiral Gallery, who wrote an article published in Collier's magazine, have made statements along that line. Admiral Gallery claimed in unqualified language that there was an attempt to build a "brass curtain" of secrecy. I think we will all agree that that would be a dangerous thing for the country.

I understood the Senator from Maryland to say earlier in the afternoon that he felt that investigation should not be conducted by his committee, but by the House committee.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is an error.

Mr. McCARTHY. Wait a moment, please. I stated, while the Senator was absent, that I feel that such a position is very erroneous. I feel that the important function of the Senator's committee is to make sure that a condition does not exist which makes it impossible for him freely to obtain information from the military branch of the Government. I stated that I sincerely hope his committee will proceed now to make an investigation and determine whether or not the claim which is now being made by many outstanding officers regarding this "brass curtain" of secrecy is true or false. I hope the Senator from Maryland will take steps in that direction.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I think the Senator misunderstood me, and I can understand how he did misunderstand me. What the Senator from Maryland attempted to say was that there is a Committee of the Armed Services in the House and one in the Senate. It has always been a matter of courtesy when one committee has taken jurisdiction of a matter, particularly an investigation, that the opposite committee in the other branch of the Congress keeps its hands off until the first committee has concluded its work, thus avoiding a multiplicity of work and the interrogating of the same witnesses, and so forth.

The matter has not been finally determined in the House committee yet. The promises about who would be removed and would not be removed, and the latitude with which witnesses would be permitted to testify, were all made over in the House committee. The chairman of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate called up the chairman of the Armed Services Committee of the House and asked him, Representative VINSON, who occupies that position, whether or not he was going to deal with this matter further, whether the Armed Services Committee of the House was going to deal with it further, and Representative VINSON told the Senator who is now speaking, the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, that that matter would be covered fully in his report, which would be made in a few days.

In view of that fact, and also in view of the courtesy connected with the whole discussion, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee of the Senate did not feel that he could advocate an investigation into a matter in which the House committee was already acting, without creating bad feeling. Therefore he preferred to wait until after the House committee had made its report before bringing this matter to the attention of his own committee in a further way.

Mr. McCARTHY. I may say to the Senator from Maryland that I think a statement made by Secretary Matthews, which appears on page 111 of the committee hearings held on January 12, should be sufficient in and of itself to inspire a very searching investigation by the Senator's committee. On page 111 Secretary Matthews is quoted as saying:

> I think that every officer should be entitled to tell the truth.

But he says if he tells the truth then he should be prepared to take the consequences. I think the Senator's committee, just from that statement alone, should find out what the consequences of telling the truth would be.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I do not want to prolong the discussion on this point. The matter is already being investigated by the House committee. I just finished telling the Senator that the promise respecting whether there would be reprisals or not was not made to the Senate committee. It was made to the House committee. I do not feel that while the House committee is investigating that very matter we should go into it. If the Senate committee were investigating the matter I would resent very much the House committee going into the matter over which we had taken jurisdiction and respecting which an investigation was already under way.

Secretary Matthews did go on further in that very testimony to support his contention that the reasoning was logical. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], who represents in part those who sit on the other side of the aisle on the Senate Committee on Armed Services, as the Senator will find from the testimony in his hand, backed up the Secretary of the Navy and said some very caustic things, which I shall not repeat.

Mr. McCARTHY. Am I correct in saying that the House committee is no longer conducting any investigations; that there are no plans to have any hearings on the part of the House committee? Does not the Senator know that to be a fact?

Mr. TYDINGS. I am sorry, I did not clearly hear the question.

Mr. McCARTHY. Does not the Senator know it to be a fact that the House committee is not now conducting an investigation and that there are no plans for any hearings?

Mr. TYDINGS. No. I know that the House committee is being polled on this matter, and I think I know what the report is going to state. I think the report is going to be very much in favor of Admiral Denfeld. But, inasmuch as the Senator from Maryland has been told all of that, he does not feel that he should duplicate what the House is almost completing, and which is going to be somewhat along the line the Senator from Wisconsin has been arguing here on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. McCARTHY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does not the junior Senator from Wisconsin agree with me and others who served in the Marine Corps during the recent war that Admiral Sherman is an outstanding naval leader of great combat experience?

Mr. McCARTHY. I most certainly do.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does not the junior Senator from Wisconsin further agree that there can be no valid objection to the appointment of Admiral Sherman to the post of Chief of Naval Operations?

Mr. McCARTHY. Not if there is a vacancy.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wonder if the junior Senator from Wisconsin will agree with me that the points of view of the Navy and Marine Corps will be intelligently and ably presented in the councils of the Joint Chiefs of Staff by Admiral Sherman, inasmuch as the Navy, for the first time, is being represented by a naval aviator who is thoroughly familiar with problems of naval aviation and who has taken such an active part in the amphibious operations which the Marine Corps carried out in the Pacific.

Mr. McCARTHY. I heartily agree.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I wish to ask the Senator, if he is not asked any more questions, how long he will continue?

Mr. McCARTHY. Oh, I would say about 3 or 4 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is recognized for 3 or 4 minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not hear the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I said: The Senator is recognized for 3 or 4 minutes.

Mr. McCARTHY. Thank you, Mr. President. I have already obtained unanimous consent to have the remainder of my prepared remarks printed in the RECORD, as though they had been given by me, for the reason that most of the material has been covered in question-and-answer form. I feel that reading the remainder of my remarks would mean unnecessary repetition.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to one matter very briefly. The matter of secrecy exists far beyond the Military Establishment. Almost 3 years ago—on March 21, 1947—President Truman made it very clear, in a written order, that the gag rule which now exists in the Pentagon should operate throughout the executive branch of our Government. At that time he issued what is known as the loyalty order. Far down in the order, and very well concealed, was a section identified as Miscellaneous. In that section, President Truman clearly stated—it is a matter of record—that a censorship board should be created in every Government department.

Let me read that section:

> The Security Advisory Board of the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee shall draft rules applicable to the handling and transmission of confidential documents and other documents which should not be publicly disclosed, and upon approval by the President, such rules shall constitute minimum standards for the handling and transmission of such documents and information, and shall be applicable to all departments and agencies of the executive branch.

The Security Advisory Board followed through on that order, and drew up an elaborate secrecy code which was distributed to the heads of the more than 50 executive departments and agencies. The code was drafted in conformity with the President's order, and more than 50 executive departments and agencies got a copy of the secrecy code. I shall not read all of it, but sections of it are being placed in the RECORD. Here is the interesting part of the censorship code:

> The term "confidential" as used herein applies to information the unauthorized disclosure of which, although not endangering the national security, would be prejudicial to the interests or prestige of the Nation or any governmental activity thereof or would cause unwarranted injury to an individual or would cause serious administrative embarrassment or difficulty.

Please note, Mr. President, and I ask all Members of the Senate to note, that the Security Advisory Board was giving the 50 governmental agencies and departments a code drafted in accordance with the President's order; and in the code the statement is made that the Security Advisory Board is concerned not only with anything which would endanger the national security, but also with anything which would "cause serious administrative embarrassment."

In other words, Mr. President, the Department heads, at the President's direction, were to gag any person in the Government's employ or any written document coming from their Department if what was said might embarrass the administration or part of it or any person in it. This censorship was not restricted to information that might endanger our national security. It was designed to withhold from the public information that might endanger the political security of the administration which happened to be in power. It has been applied to withhold information from the press and the Congress, which, in the final analysis, means it is being applied against the American people.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, Francis P. Matthews has been the subject of considerable discussion in the Senate this afternoon. I wish to state for the RECORD that Francis P. Matthews is a very distinguished resident of the State from which I come. He is a member of a political party opposite to my own party. I am sure that anyone who has known Francis P. Matthews, whether belonging to his party or to any other party, will not question the loyalty or the integrity of Mr. Matthews.

It may be that he has made some mistakes. After all, he is but human, as all of us are. I simply wish to make this statement about Francis P. Matthews, because I do not wish any of the remarks made in the Senate today to prejudice anyone in advance.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I should like to be recognized at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair wishes to state that all day he has been attempting to recognize the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], who advised the Chair that he wished to offer another amendment to the oleomargarine tax-repeal bill. However, the Chair cannot recognize the Senator from North Dakota unless he is on his feet.

The Senator from Maryland has addressed the Chair, and the Chair recognizes him.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if what I am about to say provokes additional discussion, I shall be very sorry.

But in order that the RECORD may be complete, for the purpose of carrying the news to the country, let me state that I have just been advised that Admiral Denfeld never was sworn in, and therefore did not hold a full commission, in the absence of the oath of allegiance.

The second thing I have been advised about is that the President removed Admiral Denfeld on a written order, based largely on the Myers case, which has been quoted here today, whereby the Supreme Court clothed the President with the authority to do so; and the President attached to the written order a memorandum. All that matter will be presented to the Senate.

However, I felt that the fact that Admiral Denfeld had not taken the oath, and therefore was not fully qualified, and therefore was not clothed with the office itself, and the fact that the action was taken by written order of the President, should be stated for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, lest there be misunderstanding about the matter in the country.

GOVERNOR DRISCOLL, OF NEW JERSEY, AND THE CIVIL-RIGHTS ISSUE

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, in these difficult days when we are all seeking enlightenment on the ways and means to make America sufficiently strong internally to meet its obligations to its own people and to the world, it might be well for every Member of the Congress to examine carefully the very eloquent and forceful second inaugural address of New Jersey's Governor, Alfred E. Driscoll.

Mr. President, it is a message of a man of destiny. Though it treats largely with the problems of a single State, it sounds a note which every legislative body in the Nation, including the Federal Congress, can well afford to heed.

Because of the wisdom and vision which it expounds, I recommend its careful study by every Member of this body. To this end, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be incorporated in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President, Mr. Speaker, members of the legislature, we have been given a unique opportunity to complete the tasks we have undertaken together during the past three momentous years. I propose that we proceed to do so at once.

As we review even a small portion of the record of the immediate past—a new constitution; a strong, capable, independent judiciary—the keystone of our republican form of government; the effective division of powers among the three branches of State government; executive reorganization; greater legislative responsibility; one first-class citizenship, based upon a constitutional guaranty that recognizes the God-given dignity of mankind; our faith in and respect for our fellow citizens should strengthen and renew our determination to serve them faithfully and constructively.

For any part, as I resume my duties, neither time nor familiarity with the great office of Governor of New Jersey has lessened my abiding sense of the responsibility that is ours.

It is appropriate that the establishment of a new precedent, the continuation of a governor beyond a single term, should occur in a year that marks the half-way point in the twentieth century. In the first half of our productive, turbulent, and frequently terrifying century, we have achieved greater technological, industrial, and personal gains than were achieved in all previously recorded history. And yet, in this same period of time, we have come closer to losing our very souls than at any time since the Dark Ages.

Within the half-century, mass production became an American achievement—even a fetish. Early in 1901 a startled American populace received word that a billion-dollar corporation had been formed in New Jersey. The race to be the biggest and the richest was on in earnest. Big corporations were to be followed by big unions and big government. In fact, bigness was to become a center of controversy, frequently more violent than thoughtful.

The events of the first 50 years stimulated the organization of the group interest mentioned in my message to the legislature 3 years ago. These same events promoted centralized authority upon the theory expressed by Woodrow Wilson in his inaugural address as Governor, that we cannot "pit power against weakness." As our society became more complex, the individual became more dependent upon the activities of his fellows, and new methods were sought to overcome his growing feeling of insecurity. By the same token, the task of government became more complex, yet there was no planning to meet complexity. We moved into a period of government by crisis. The National Government assumed to undertake new services of great social and economic significance, but was unwilling to recognize the consequences of its assumption of vast centralized power.

Our whole world has changed in the last 50 years. The big Government that has grown from year to year to meet the challenge of big wars, big depressions, and to provide greater security, contains the elements of insecurity.

In our search for freedom, and in our defense of it, we have come close to losing freedom. Despite our efforts to achieve security, we are not yet secure.

Our mastery of the art of government and our ability to govern ourselves and our world have lagged far behind the technological and materialistic advances that have come to us during the first half of the twentieth century.

We are gradually learning that while objectives are important, methods are equally important. The methods employed in some countries to achieve security actually prevented the people of those countries from attaining their objectives. Furthermore, freedom was lost. The methods to which I refer resulted first in a centralization of the government and finally in its ultimate destruction.

In its report to the Congress of the United States, the Hoover Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government asked two pertinent questions:

"1. How can the American type of democracy—a democracy based on individual liberty and extensive citizen participation in and control of government—be maintained and strengthened?

"2. At the same time, how shall government provide the services which people increasingly demand and which are necessary for the general welfare?"

The Hoover Commission recommended that the functions and activities of government be appraised to determine which can be most advantageously operated by the various levels of government and which require joint policy making, financing, and administration. The Commission proposed that our tax systems—"National, State, and local—be generally revised and that, in this revision, every possible effort be made to leave to the localities and the States adequate resources from which to raise revenue to meet the duties and responsibilities of local and State governments."

The Commission urged "that the grant-in-aid plan and program be clarified and systematized." The Commission states in its report that to accomplish these recommendations in an orderly and adequate manner a continuing agency on Federal-State relations should be created.

In our efforts to secure an orderly, responsive, economical government, these recommendations are vitally important to all of us. It is my hope that the recommendations of the Hoover Commission will be adopted. I recommend that appropriate steps be taken by you to memorialize Congress to adopt the recommendations of the Hoover Commission as quickly as possible.

The urgency of these proposals is to be found in the fact that the President, in his budget message for the fiscal year 1950–51, has recommended an increase in Federal grants-in-aid of approximately a billion dollars over those found in the grants allocated in the budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1949.

There is a far more simple and effective method of accomplishing our social and economic objectives than the methods presently being employed. Current methods merely result in the speed-up of a vicious circle in which expensive grants-in-aid with unnecessary administrative costs compel the Federal Government to levy abnormally high taxes. Many of the services contemplated by these grants could be provided by the States with greater economy to meet local needs if the resources which formerly belonged to them were returned.

We must end our flight from yesterday's crises and, by a prudent appraisal of our needs, careful planning and the application of common sense, avoid tomorrow's catastrophies. During this stock-taking period we shall seek to consolidate our gains and complete our unfinished business.

Our State government during the past 3 years has been engaged in the hard task of putting its house in order, so that it might more efficiently serve its citizens. In three previous messages, as well as in legislative and executive action, we have stressed the importance of keeping government as close to the people as possible. We have emphasized again and again that the continued nationalization of our Government threatens to completely destroy our Federal system and home rule. One sure way to destroy our Federal system and home rule is for the States to fail to provide for the general welfare of their citizens.

This then represents the heart of our philosophy: an orderly Federal system with government close to the people, prudently managed. Government free to test old values, to seek new values. Government strong enough and courageous enough to pioneer with the times, promoting the general welfare in the service of all of its people. New programs in government carried on at the State or local level do not place in jeopardy the economy of the entire Nation and need not be adopted by all until they have proved their general worth. A system in which the citizens control the destiny of government rather than government controlling the destiny of its people.

It is our responsibility to clarify the relationship between State government, our counties, municipalities, and school districts. The recommendations of the commission on municipal government, as modified by another year of careful study, should be adopted. We should strengthen the capacity of our municipalities to govern themselves and to mold their form of government to fit the needs of their citizens.

The commission should be continued. In cooperation with representatives of our local government and the members of the tax policy commission, it should be authorized to appraise the services now being rendered by government within the State in a serious effort to reduce overlapping and conflicting services and dual responsibility.

During this study period, I advise that we hold the line against any and all additional expenditures not absolutely required to meet emergency needs. New Jersey enjoys the lowest per capita State tax collection in the Nation. We shall strive to maintain that favorable position. On the other hand, there is growing awareness of the need to modernize an antiquated tax system with many inequities. At your request the tax policy commission is engaged in this study. In my judgment, the study should be broadened. In cooperation with representatives of our local government every phase of the problem should be analyzed.

Since our primary concern this year is to finish tasks to which we have set our hands during the past 3 years, it is not necessary for me to review all of the recommendations of the last 3 years. Nonetheless, I should like to make it abundantly clear that I have not changed my position on any of the recommendations heretofore made.

Our concern for an orderly and economical government has not prevented us from adopting programs designed to protect and promote the health, safety, and welfare of our citizens. New Jersey has pioneered in the development of these programs within the framework of a private-enterprise economy.

We must face the fact that the National Government continues to be committed to deficit financing. This is inflationary. It means less purchasing power both for the State's tax dollars and for the individual's pension-and-insurance benefits. If our insurance programs, including particularly sickness benefits and unemployment compensation, are to have real meaning and accomplishment their purpose, the present maximum benefit payments should be increased to levels that will permit them to accomplish their objectives. Further, we should eliminate the present discrimination between employees of firms employing four or more persons and those employing less than four. Every effort should be made to limit benefits to those entitled to them, but those who are entitled to benefits should be protected by recognition of the new wage structure of industry.

It is sound policy to place our emphasis upon these insurance programs, rather than upon direct relief. The New Jersey unemployment compensation trust fund in Washington contains credits of over $400,000,000. We are fortunate in having the largest reserve ratio of any industrial State in the Union.

Last year we achieved full coverage of occupational diseases under our workmen's compensation law. A number of inequities still remain to be corrected this year. Provision should be made for the prompt settlement of all compensation cases, including a board of review within the department of labor and industry and a direct appeal to the appellate division of the superior court, eliminating the present appeal to the county courts.

The right to organize and bargain collectively, guaranteed in our new Constitution, should be augmented by a State labor-relations law applicable to intrastate employees. Our present minimum wage law should be made more comprehensive.

Within the State government we should consolidate and systematize all agencies engaged in the various categories of welfare services. The Department of Institutions and Agencies is presently engaged in the consolidation of its activities. Nonetheless, two State departments, several Federal agencies, the counties and municipalities are all engaged in welfare services. This arrangement is neither economically sound nor administratively desirable. State welfare activities should be confined to a single State department. The number of levels of government engaged in welfare services should be reduced. A report on this subject will be submitted to you shortly for your consideration.

There will be no security, either in private or public pension programs, nor in our national old-age and survivors insurance program—in which New Jersey has a vital stake—until we have reasonable prospects that future prices will remain within reasonable limits of today's promises of future benefit payments. Deficit financing, poor planning, and extravagance in government promote insecurity rather than security. We have taken the position that the National Government should not expand its direct relief activities at a time when the emphasis should rather be placed upon the strengthening of old-age and survivors insurance, expanding its coverage, thus reducing the need for Federal old-age assistance, in which the State is a participant. As part of our tradition that the State should seek to do more and more for itself, while asking less and less of the National Government, I recommend that the entire subject of pensions and our insurance programs be studied in the light of our postwar experience and to the end that State policies may be established at the State level.

On numerous occasions, I have stressed the fact that our problems are largely social and economic, not political. In common with all other States, New Jersey is facing serious fiscal problems. The demand for services by our citizens far exceeds available revenues. A most striking illustration of this fact is to be found in the field of education. Since our capacity to increase State aid for education is limited to available revenues, I shall discuss that subject in my budget message.

Our teacher salary schedules and pension programs should be further strengthened. I recommend that the members of the State board of education should be chosen from the State at large, with no limitation in regard to the number to be chosen from any one county, and that the terms of two members of the board shall expire each year. I recommend that legislation be adopted authorizing the board of education to appoint a commissioner, subject to the approval of the Governor.

The 1949 report of the President's Highway Safety Conference states "the outstanding achievement during this year was made in New Jersey. Legislation was enacted for a State-wide system of county district courts and municipal courts to replace police courts, recorders' courts, family courts, magistrate courts, justice of peace courts, city district courts, and small cause courts. The new courts are an integral part of the State judicial system, under supervision of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court." The new system appears to be working well. It does, however, require further strengthening.

Everyone, I believe, recognizes the need for greater uniformity in traffic regulations throughout the country. I recommend that we adopt a uniform vehicle code. Effective action should be taken to prevent destruction of our highways by trucks of excessive weight and size. These trucks constitute a definite menace to other users of our highways. New Jersey should seek uniform regulations with its neighboring States on this and on subjects relating to the use of our highways.

Good traffic laws and effective enforcement can do much to reduce the toll of traffic accidents; but our major need must remain improved and modernized highways throughout the State. During the past 3 years, we have allocated almost $180,000,000 for the construction, maintenance, and safety of highways at the State, county, and municipal levels. These new highways include freeways and parkways that are now under construction, to relieve traffic bottlenecks in our major cities.

The New Jersey turnpike is a major piece of our unfinished business. The innovation of the turnpike in New Jersey which fundamentally becomes the backbone of the new State highway system has required a restudy of all of our highway planning to take full advantage of the turnpike's great potentialities. For the first time, we are in a position to anticipate meeting fully the requirements of the world's heaviest traffic load. The continued development of freeways in the metropolitan areas of north and south Jersey, such as the Trenton and Camden freeways soon to be completed, will continue a major policy of our administration.

We have yet to overtake the needs of the automotive age, but we are pledged to continue the effort. With a view toward a full solution of our State's transportation problems, I renew to you the program and recommendations which are already before you for a coordinated highway, rail, air, and water transportation system, which will not only relieve our roads but secure high-speed transit facilities in north and south Jersey.

Water shortage is not a new problem in New Jersey. The current shortage is in part due to a deficiency in rainfall and in part to a steady increase in demands—in face of an inherently deficient water-supply system. No large additional supplies of water have been made available since the Wanaque system was put into operation in 1930.

I recommend the creation of a water authority within the department of conservation and economic development empowered to immediately complete the Delaware and Raritan Canal water supply project as authorized by the legislature in 1943. The completion of this project will make available an additional 75,000,000 gallons a day for the lower Raritan Valley between Bound Brook and New Brunswick and can be made available north into Union County as far as Elizabeth.

This authority would be further empowered, subject to the approval of the legislature, to develop other sources of water. It should be understood that the purpose of the authority is to cooperate with municipalities of the State; the New Jersey District Water Supply Commission and other State and interstate agencies.

In addition, the State should sponsor a Tri-State Water Authority, including Pennsylvania and New York, to develop the water resources of the Delaware River watershed and to make those resources available to the citizens of the three States. My studies indicate that these projects may be completed on a pay-as-you-go basis. The modern industries of New Jersey, and the employment they provide, are very largely dependent upon a sure source of water.

As I have previously stated, one substitute for big government in Washington is responsive, serviceable, State governments and interstate cooperation.

Our institutions are performing modern miracles in the treatment of persons suffering from mental illness. Seventy-four percent of the admissions to our mental hospitals are now being returned to society in less than 6 months, and an additional 13 percent are cured within 6 to 11 months. There are, of course, incurable cases. When the construction program that will be undert ken this year is completed, we may confidently expect an improved rate of cure or correction. This has many advantages—humanitarian, as well as economic.

Our mental hospitals have, over a period of years, served not only as places for active treatment, but also as social and scientific laboratories for the testing of procedures and practices that have won the praise and support of the medical profession. The $25,000,000 rehabilitation and construction program approved last November will permit us to overcome the fire hazards that presently exist within our institutions and take initial steps to eliminate serious overcrowded conditions.

The need for the development of regional health services, and the strengthening of intermunicipal cooperation, is apparent. The department of health has been authorized to create regional health districts. We believe that through the medium of State and local cooperation, in close association with the medical profession and the encouragement of private medical and surgical plans, we can make adequate medical care available to all of our citizens. It is apparent, however, that there is a very real need for medical training facilities within our State. We are exploring every phase of this knotty problem.

Last year I urged the adoption of a broad program providing for a concerted attack upon our slum areas and for the stimulation of low-rent housing within the reach of families of limited incomes. The program was adopted. As a result of the November election, we will not be able to use the State's credit in furtherance of this program.

A large amount of rental housing and home construction has been undertaken in the past year. Despite this, and after an extensive study of the problem, the Temporary Committee on Housing (J. R. 4, 1948) clearly shows, in its report which has recently been filed with you, that there still exists a need for housing which can be made available at a cost of from $50 to $60 per month and less. Moreover, the social cost of slums and the need for slum clearance is just as great as ever. We shall not abandon our housing responsibilities to the Federal Government. But the initiation of the Federal program, under which many of our municipalities plan to act, makes it prudent to reexamine our previous plans.

We can take encouragement from the recent and gradually increasing development of serious interest among builders in our new limited dividend housing law. We shall stimulate and foster this interest to the fullest. Legislation further to strengthen this law and to provide additional encouragement to private enterprise to engage in large-scale middle-income housing construction will be submitted to you shortly.

The department of law and public safety and the department of health are now jointly engaged in the formulation of plans to provide, with the cooperation of our local governments, a unified and vigorous enforcement of all laws and ordinances applicable to substandard housing.

The continued shortage of housing, particularly in our urban areas, requires that we devote our attention to the need for the continuation of rent controls until such time as there is a reasonable balance between housing supply and demand. I urge you to adopt legislation establishing a State stand-by residental rent control law—one that will serve fully to protect our citizens should the Federal Government decide to withdraw from this activity.

An extensive study of the building code situation in our State was undertaken by the temporary committee on housing. Its report shows that we have today 179 different building codes in municipalities of 2,500 population or over. In addition, 60 percent of these codes range in age from 11 to 30 years and present a condition which seriously stifles the realization of low-cost homes.

The need for uniformity, simplification and standardization in this field is crystal clear. Accordingly, I urge the immediate adoption of legislation creating a State building code commission with authority to formulate modern, performance-type building codes. Much of the spade work along these lines has already been gotten under way through the division of planning and development. The legislation should include authorization for the formulation of up-to-date plumbing and electrical installation requirements, adequate local option provisions in the adoption of the code, and enforcement and supervision at the local level.

On the agenda of unfinished business, I urge you to provide for a much-needed continuing revision of our general statutes; continue support of our notable civilian defense program; strengthen our veterans' services in which New Jersey has pioneered; and make provision for the protection of our resort areas and the development of new parks, including particularly the Sandy Hook project.

There will be plenty of hard work for all of us. The legislature will want to participate in the studies and hearings that must be completed prior to final consideration of a modern and equitable fiscal system. The legislature will also have an opportunity to perfect its own techniques, including the consideration of a legislative council which, from the point of view of the executive branch of the State government, will promote a good working relationship with the legislature during the period when the latter is not in session.

I have enjoyed our work together during the past 3 years. We have been engaged in large undertakings. We have been an intimate part of the forces that for ages past have been seeking a better way of life for mankind. I am looking forward to a continuation of our pleasant and constructive relationship. Despite the pessimism of some, we live in a good world. It is a world of opportunity, particularly in the field of government.

As we move ahead in the service of our fellow citizens, let us dedicate ourselves to giving a new warmth, a new dignity to the basic strength of our sacred heritage as citizens of a republic of free people. Under divine guidance, our aims, our hopes, and our prayers for lasting peace, a world in which spiritual values are paramount and in which each person is free to play his part, will be achieved.

Respectfully submitted.

ALFRED E. DRISCOLL,
Governor.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. In a moment.

But, Mr. President, I do not stop there. I would remind this distinguished assembly that Governor Driscoll was reelected primarily because of his complete integrity on an issue which the Congress has evaded far too long. I refer to the civil-rights issue. This issue is before us today. It will be with us for some days. Let us solve it courageously and squarely, as New Jersey solved it in its consitutional convention. Let us, too, recognize that ours is a Government for all of the people without regard to race, creed, color, or religious affiliation.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks an editorial entitled "Governor Driscoll's Address," which appears in today's issue of the New York Times.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOVERNOR DRISCOLL'S ADDRESS

The statement of principles with which Governor Driscoll begins his second term will be read with interest outside New Jersey for its strong affirmation of the desirability of self-reliance at the lower levels of government. This is in the nature of reiteration; the Governor made the same point last December in an address here, when he said, "We want to do more and more for ourselves and ask less and less from others." It is a theme that echoes with frequency of late. It was dominant in Governor Dewey's recent message opening the New York legislative session. It was emphasized, we are especially pleased to note, in the letter published yesterday of the State Conference of Mayors to Governor Dewey and the legislature.

Our cities and States might well take to heart one warning uttered by Governor Driscoll in his inaugural speech: "One sure way," he remarked, "to destroy our Federal system and home rule is for the States to fail to provide for the general welfare of their citizens." The same lesson applies to the relations between the State and its localities—a fact recognized when Mr. Driscoll urges strengthening of the capacity of cities to govern themselves and to mold their form of government to fit the needs of their citizens.

Most of the problems of New Jersey are not unique except in emphasis. Some of these and the general philosophy for dealing with them bear a marked similarity with the pattern of Governor Dewey's message. The fiscal situation is troublesome. The demands for services by our citizens far exceed available revenues. After reviewing the several fields in which he hopes to extend progress already made and others in which new ground needs to be broken, Governor Driscoll reminds us that "despite the pessimism of some, we live in a good world." He sees this as a world of opportunity for government, but his fundamental interest is in keeping government close to the people.

We wish the Governor well in his second term as he seeks to continue in New Jersey the progress acknowledged by the voters in returning him to office.

REPEAL OF OLEOMARGARINE TAXES

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2023) to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment numbered A.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 4, line 19, after the word "of" it is proposed to insert "the foregoing provisions of."

On page 5, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the word "This" and insert in lieu thereof "The foregoing provisions of this."

On page 5, after line 6, it is proposed to add the following new sections:

SEC. . The requirement that a poll tax be paid as a prerequisite to voting or registering to vote at primaries or other elections for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, is not and shall not be deemed a qualification of voters or electors voting or registering to vote at primaries or other elections for said officers, within the meaning of the Constitution, but is and shall be deemed an interference with the manner of holding primaries and other elections for said national officers and a tax upon the right or privilege of voting for said national officers.

SEC. . It shall be unlawful for any State, municipality, or other Government or governmental subdivision to prevent any person from voting or registering to vote in any primary or other election for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, on the ground that such person has not paid a poll tax and any such requirement shall be invalid and void insofar as it purports to disqualify any person otherwise qualified to vote in such primary or other election. No State, municipality, or other Government or governmental subdivision shall levy a poll tax or any other tax on the right or privilege of voting in such primary or other election, and any such tax shall be invalid and void insofar as it purports to disqualify any person otherwise qualified from voting at such primary or other election.

SEC. . It shall be unlawful for any State, municipality, or other Government or governmental subdivision to interfere with the manner of selecting persons for national office by requiring the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting or registering to vote in any primary or other election for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, and any such requirement shall be invalid and void.

SEC. . It shall be unlawful for any person, whether or not acting under the cover of authority of the laws of any State or subdivision thereof, to require the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting or registering to vote in any primary or other election for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, in connection with this amendment, I also want to read a resolution which I am going to send to the desk, on which I am going to ask the Senate to take action after it is referred to the proper committee. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a thorough investigation to determine (1) what connection, if any, Lever Bros., or any subsidiary or affiliate thereof, had with raising the price of oleomargarine any time within the last 10 years, particularly at any time when legislation to remove the tax on oleomargarine was under consideration by the Congress of the United States—

I may say, Mr. President, that about a year ago when the oleomargarine question was up before the Senate, when it looked as though the bill removing the tax from oleomargarine might pass, at a time when the argument in favor of removing the tax from oleo was that the poor people would be able to buy oleo at a low price, rather than buy butter, at that very time Lever Bros. investment company and another corporation got together to corner oleomargarine not only in the United States but all over the world, and within a space of 3 weeks the price of oleomargarine was raised 23 cents a pound. I believe that should be investigated. When we remove the tax from oleo, are we doing it for the benefit of the common people of the country, or are we doing it for the benefit of a great big trust?—

(2) whether an attempt to corner the market on oleomargarine was made by or on behalf of Lever Bros. or any such subsidiary or affiliate; (3) what part, if any, Charles Luckman, as president of Lever Bros., had in any such attempt to corner the market and increase the price of oleomargarine—

I may say this is the same Charles Luckman who recently was appointed—I do not know by whom—to be general manager for the Democratic Party in the holding of its Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners all over the United States. I am curious to know why this man, whose company only a short time ago was sued by the United States Government for being part of a trust, and who came before the court pleading nolo contendere, saying, "Yes; it is all true," and who was a member of an outfit that paid a $50,000 fine—this man was one of the defendants, who, with others, paid a fine of $50,000—I am curious to know why that man should have been chosen by the Democratic Party, which says it is fighting the trusts, which says it is for the poor people, and that all the trusts belong to the Republican Party. I am curious to know why that man should have been chosen out of 157,000,000 people in this country by the Democratic Party to be at the head and to act as general manager of all the Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners to be held all over the country—and (4) whether there is or has been a conspiracy on the part of the Lever Bros., its subsidiaries, or affiliates, and any other concerns, to violate the antitrust laws in causing an increase in the price of oleomargarine at any time during the last 10 years, and particularly to ascertain the part played therein by Charles Luckman, either individually or as president of Lever Bros., and whether in furtherance of such conspiracy legislation was proposed which would permit importation either without tax or with a very low tax of products in competition with the dairy farmers of the United States. The committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is directed in connection with such investigation to cause a subpena to be served upon the said Charles Luckman for the purpose of obtaining his testimony with respect to any matters which it considers relevant thereto.

The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, not later than April 1, 1950, the results of its investigation, together with such recommendations as it may deem desirable.

The resolution (S. Res. 213) submitted by Mr. LANGER was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a thorough investigation to determine (1) what connection, if any, Lever Bros., or any subsidiary or affiliate thereof, had with raising the price of oleomargarine any time within the last 10 years, particularly at any time when legislation to remove the tax on oleomargarine was under consideration by the Congress of the United States; (2) whether an attempt to corner the market on oleomargarine was made by or on behalf of Lever Bros. or any such subsidiary or affiliate; (3) what part, if any, Charles Luckman, as president of Lever Bros., had in any such attempt to corner the market and increase the price of oleomargarine; and (4) whether there is or has been a conspiracy on the part of the Lever Bros., its subsidiaries or affiliates, and any other concerns, to violate the antitrust laws in causing an increase in the price of oleomargarine at any time during the last 10 years, and particularly to ascertain the part played therein by Charles Luckman, either individually or as president of Lever Bros., and whether in furtherance of such conspiracy, legislation was proposed which would permit importation either without tax or with a very low tax of products in competition with the dairy farmers of the United States. The committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is directed in connection with such investigation to cause a subpena to be served upon the said Charles Luckman for the purpose of obtaining his testimony with respect to any matters which it considers relevant thereto.

The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, not later than April 1, 1950, the results of its investigation together with such recommendations as it may deem desirable.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, in connection with the question which we are now discussing, I desire to offer another resolution. The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules and Administration, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a thorough investigation for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of campaign contributions made at any time during the last 10 years by or on behalf of Charles Luckman personally or by or on behalf of Lever Bros., or any of its subsidiaries or affiliates, to the Democratic or Republican National Committees, or to any State committee of the Democratic or Republican Parties, or to any individual representing the Democratic or Republican Parties. The committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is directed in connection with such investigation to cause a subpoena to be served upon the said Charles Luckman for the purpose of obtaining his testimony with respect to any matters which it considers relevant thereto.

The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date, not later than April 1, 1950, the results of its investigation together with such recommendations as it may deem desirable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will examine the resolution. Unless it involves an investigation as to the violation of the antitrust law, it would not automatically go to the Judiciary Committee. The Chair will take a look at it and reserve his ruling as to that.

(Subsequently, the resolution (S. Res. 214) submitted by Mr. LANGER, was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.)

Mr. LANGER. I may say, Mr. President, that the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania some 3 or 4 hours ago, when he talked upon the first amendment I offered, the one dealing with antilynching, said, among other things, "I have fought consistently for civil rights." That is what was said by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania. Well, Mr. President, it is passing strange to me that the Democratic Party, which has been in power since January 1933, a matter of 16 years, during the overwhelming majority of which time they had a majority of 2 to 1 in the House and a majority once of 4 to 1 in the Senate, at a time when they could pass any kind of legislation they wished, never once enforced the criminal provisions of the Sherman Antitrust Act. We then had a President, elected upon the platform that he was going to enforce laws; that he was going to fight for the little man. In his speeches he said that all the big corporations were supporting the Republican Party, and so he was elected by an overwhelming vote. Sixteen years later what do we find? We find appointed as head of the Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners the head of the Oleomargarine Trust—not only a trust here in the United States but a trust so large that when the president of Lever Bros. died a short time ago in Minneapolis the Minneapolis Tribune said he represented 530 corporations scattered all over the world.

How large is this Lever Bros. corporation and its affiliates? They have a branch away over in Belgium. They have a branch in the Netherlands. They have a branch in Scandinavia. They have a branch in Finland. They have a branch in the Netherlands East Indies. They have a branch in Italy. They have a branch in Switzerland. They have a branch in Austria. They have a branch in Germany. This octopus has a branch in Czechoslovakia. It has a branch in Poland. It has a branch in Hungary. Yes, this great octopus has a branch in Yugoslavia. It has a branch in Rumania. The outfit of Charles Luckman, who is at the head of the Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners of the Democratic Party, has a branch in France. It has another branch in Denmark. It has a branch in Norway. It has a branch in the Belgian Congo. It is doing business and has a branch in Siam. It has a branch in China. It has a branch in the Republic of the Philippines. It has a branch in the Argentine. It has a branch in Brazil. It has a branch in the United States, its headquarters being in Boston. It has a branch in Canada. It has a branch in the West Indies. It has a branch in Newfoundland. It has a branch in Ireland.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LANGER. I refuse to yield at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. LANGER. This octopus has a branch in Palestine. It has a branch in Egypt. It has a branch in British West Africa. It has a branch in the Union of South Africa. It has a branch in Pakistan. It has a branch in India. I do not know whether the general manager of this great, big octopus, who is also general manager of the Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners of the Democratic Party, the party which says it represents the poor people, is going to have these Jackson-Jefferson Day dinners in all these countries or not. I do not know whether he is going to serve oleo or butter at those banquets. But he also has a branch in Burma, a branch in Australia, a branch in the Solomon Islands, a branch in New Zealand. Another arm of this great octopus is in Chile. Another arm is in Uruguay, and another arm of the octopus is in Tunisia. Another arm is in Asia. This great corporation, the largest in the world, far larger than General Motors Corp., far larger than the United States Steel Corp., has a branch in Syria, a branch in Iraq, another branch in Iran, another branch in Morocco, another branch in the Canary Islands.

I do not know whether the Democrats will have canaries singing at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners, but, in any event, this great corporation has a branch in the Canary Islands. It has other branches in Gambia, Portuguese Guinea, French Guinea, Sierra Leone, and Liberia.

Mr. President, the Democratic Party is holding some Jefferson-Jackson Day dinners, and I understand they are $100 a plate. If a man takes his wife or his sweetheart it would cost him $200. The man in charge of all these dinners is the President of Lever Bros., the greatest oleomargarine manufacturer in the world. It produces 75 percent of all the oleomargarine sold in Great Britain, and it has branches, as I have said, all over the world. I stopped with the fifty-fourth branch. It has other branches. Wherever there are people, Mr. President, it has a branch. It has 68 branches in all, including a branch on the Gold Coast of Africa, in Nigeria, and in the Belgian Congo.

As I said when I submitted a resolution a while ago, Mr. President, we are curious to know how it happened that this outfit raised the price of oleomargarine 23 cents a pound, at the very time, a year ago, when it was thought we would take the tax from oleomargarine. I have letters from all over the country telling me to vote to take the tax off oleomargarine and saying, "We are going to get it 10 cents a pound cheaper." But instead of that, the price went up until it was raised 23 cents a pound in 3 weeks. If the bill had been passed, that is what the people of the city of Washington and the people of every State in the United States would have had to pay for oleomargarine.

Mr. President, this morning the distinguished majority leader read a telegram. As a matter of fact, he read two telegrams. He said there were two great organizations which did not want the civil-rights amendment offered in connection with the oleomargarine bill. The distinguished Presiding Officer will remember that the Senator read those telegrams. I received one of those telegrams myself. Mine is signed by Roy Wilkins, acting secretary. He does not say of what he is acting secretary, so I have to read the telegram. He says:

We have just sent the following telegram to various Members of the Senate:

"On behalf of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People we urge you to defeat the so-called civil-rights amendments offered by Senator WILLIAM LANGER to H. R. 2023, the bill to repeal oleomargarine taxes. As you know, this association, since its inception 40 years ago, has worked unceasingly to win for all persons, regardless of race, religion, or color, security of person and freedom of political and economic opportunity. Senator LANGER does not intend these amendments to further the cause of civil rights. He desires only to defeat the oleomargarine tax repeal."

It is very strange how this man knows what is going on in my mind. As a matter of fact, he knows nothing about it, and I make this statement, without fear of contradiction, that WILLIAM LANGER, of North Dakota, has done more for civil rights than this man Wilkins has done during all his lifetime. I ascertained that these organizations never voted to send these telegrams at all, Mr. President. This man represents no one but himself. There are several thousand delegates in their congress, and that congress never adopted a resolution with regard to this subject, and yet Mr. Wilkins sends me a telegram.

I say, shame on Mr. Wilkins for presuming to send a telegram which he says represents the views of his organization, when, as a matter of fact, no executive committee and no membership ever authorized him to send this telegram.

Mr. President, a man came to me who represents the National Negro Council, with 2,000,000 members—Negroes from every State in the Union. He filed this statement with me:

Edgar G. Brown, director, National Negro Council, calls on Senator LUCAS, majority leader of the Senate, to demand vote on Langer civil-rights amendments and not move to table and cut off debate on these measures.

A 200-man civil-rights delegation from Illinois, and Edgar G. Brown, director of the National Negro Council, representing more than a million signers to a petition supporting the President's civil-rights program—

A million persons signed this petition, Mr. President—supporting the President's civil-rights program, called upon Senator SCOTT W. LUCAS (Democrat, Illinois), majority leader of the Senate, to get a vote now on the Langer civil-rights amendments to the oleo bill, pending on the floor of the Senate.

To get a vote now, Mr. President—not a year or 5 years or 10 years from now. The distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND] yesterday admitted that the Democratic Party had been playing politics with all the civil-rights measures, and, for good measure, he accused the Republicans of doing likewise. I do not know what he knows about the Republican Party, but here is a leading Democrat, a man who has been governor of his State and is now Senator, admitting that the Democratic Party has been playing politics with the civil-rights issue.

So the director of the National Negro Council says they want to get a vote now. A million Negroes who signed this petition want a vote now. They want to get a vote now on the Langer civil-rights amendments to the oleo bill pending on the floor of the Senate.

The civil-rights delegation pointed out to Senator LUCAS that any motion made by him to lay the Langer civil-rights amendments on the table and any subsequent votes by any Senators to kill off any further consideration of civil rights at the very first opportunity in the second session of this Congress to vote in the Senate on civil rights would be construed and recorded as an unfriendly and destructive action, calculated only to indefinitely hold off the sincere supporters of civil rights and play into the hands of the Dixiecrat enemies of civil-rights legislation and defeat the patriotic demand of 15,000,000 Negroes, who sent 1,000,000 of their sons and daughters to fight in World War II for first-class citizenship in our American democracy.

The statement of the director of the National Negro Council continues:

The civil-rights delegation further pointed out to Senator LUCAS that in 20 years of Republican rule and 18 years of Democratic control of Congress no single antilynching bill had ever reached the voting stage in the Senate under the old two-thirds majority cloture rule or the new 64 two-thirds rule to stop filibuster by limitation of debate, in order to bring such legislation to a final vote in the Senate.

In 38 years, Mr. President, 20 years under the Republicans and 18 years under the Democrats, the antilynching bill has never been brought to a vote. No wonder a million Negroes signed the petition.

Edgar G. Brown, the spokesman, stated to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS]:

There is the best chance in 40 years to get a vote now in the Senate by meeting this Senate parliamentary situation and the Dixiecrat filibuster tactics head on and calling for a vote on the Langer civil-rights amendments now which are the pending motion before the Senate. If the Senate leadership is seriously determined to carry out the President's demand to stay in Washington all summer if need be to pass the President's civil rights, there is no logic in the Senate leadership making a motion to lay the Langer civil-rights amendments on the table at this time. The President's civil-rights program as sponsored by Senator LANGER (Republican, North Dakota) is now the pending amendments before the Senate, and the final effort to force a vote, as the President promised the civil-rights delegation at the White House yesterday, can be fought out now by the majority leader, Senator LUCAS, demanding a Senate vote on civil rights. It takes the same 64 two-thirds vote of the Senate membership at this time, just as it would take 64 two-thirds vote at some future date set by the Senate majority leader, Senator LUCAS, to vote on civil rights. The true friends of civil rights—and those Senators of both parties who ever intended to actually vote for the civil-rights legislation that so often has been promised and much lip service and ballyhoo broadcast have the best opportunity to make good to the Negro people by standing up now and being counted by voting for the Langer civil-rights amendments to the oleo bill now the only business officially before the Senate of the United States. Any promise of later consideration for civil-rights action by the Senate is patently and simply another filibuster tactic, this time the resort of the vote-dodging and those secretly opposed to the civil-rights program who have been fooling the Negro people by some ramification of these tactics for the past 25 years to my personal knowledge. The record is going to be made and recorded for the Eighty-first Congress and the Senate majority leadership on the Langer civil-rights amendments. A move by Senator LUCAS to table means defeat of civil rights and all Senators voting for it know it and the voters will know it from now on.

Say these million Negroes through their leader, Edgar G. Brown—

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a telegram sent to me by Roy Wilkins, acting secretary, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, be printed in full in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 16, 1950.

Senator WILLIAM LANGER,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

We have just sent the following telegram to various Members of Senate: "On behalf of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People we urge the defeat of the so-called civil-rights amendments offered by Senator WILLIAM LANGER to H. R. 2023, the bill to repeal oleomargarine tax. As you know this association since its inception 40 years ago has worked unceasingly to win for all persons, regardless of race, religion, or nationality security of person and freedom of political and economic opportunity. Senator LANGER does not intend for his amendments to further the cause of civil rights, he desires only to defeat the oleomargarine tax repeal. Senator LANGER made this clear in his speech on the Senate floor January 11 when he charged that the passage of H. R. 2023, 'will ruin thousands of farmers in the State of North Dakota.' Last year this association actively supported amendments to prohibit racial segregation in housing and education when respective bills were before the Senate. Racial discrimination in both of these fields is widely practiced and should be banned in all Federal aid to such programs. Lynching, poll taxes, and other civil-rights questions are not, however, germane to or involved in the repeal of the oleomargarine taxes. We therefore urge the defeat of the so-called Langer civil-rights amendments."

ROY WILKINS,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I now wish to make it very clear to the distinguished Members of the Senate why I offer these amendments at this particular time. As a friend of the Negro and a friend of the poor whites, I can only say that for 9 years, during all the time I have been a Member of the Senate, we have tried repeatedly to get a vote in the Senate on an antilynching bill, an anti-poll-tax bill, or on an FEPC measure, and it has not been done. Edgar G. Brown, whom I have just quoted, the director of the National Negro Council, says that to his own personal knowledge 25 years have passed and they have been unable to get a vote.

What did we find in 1932? We found President Roosevelt, as a candidate, talking about what? He wanted votes, so he talked about the underprivileged one-third. He talked and talked and talked. Nearly everyone believed that if the people were to make him President, and put the Democratic Party in power, one of the very first things they would do would be to pass civil-rights legislation. They were very powerful. They brought back whisky, Mr. President. They brought back the old saloon, where a young boy or girl could go and get drunk, standing up or sitting down. They brought back the saloon. They had a must program in Washington, and all they had to do was to call the tune. In the House they had a majority of 3 to 1, and in the Senate at one time the Republicans had only 16 Members. There were 80 Democratic Senators to 16 Republicans. Did they pass a civil-rights bill? Not one, Mr. President, not one. Talk about hypocrisy!

Four years went by, and again we heard about the underprivileged one-third, and again the Democrats were put into power. In 1940, in 1944, and in 1948 there was the same old cry, "We are for the poor people, we are for the Negro, we are for the poor whites."

Yesterday I received a pamphlet, Mr. President, sent to me from 312 Pennsylvania Avenue SE., Washington, D. C., by Dewey Anderson, executive director of the Public Affairs Institute. Again they are out fooling the Negro, or attempting to.

I said yesterday that whenever a Negro got into some organization or society and became prominent, within a short time his name was on the Democratic pay roll somewhere in the Government.

Now let us see what this new outfit is, the Public Affairs Institute. After 18 years of confessed failure, when today the Negroes are worse off than they were when Mr. Roosevelt was first elected, something new appears—the Public Affairs Institute. Who are its sponsors? John M. Carmody is one of the sponsors. For years he was on the public pay roll, drawing one of the large salaries in the Government. Here he shows up again. This time he is a sponsor or director of the Public Affairs Institute.

Another sponsor is Hugh B. Mitchell, a former Member of this body, and now a Member of the House of Representatives. But during the time he was out of office, between the time he was a Senator and the time he was a Representative, he had a Federal job. Now we find him as a sponsor of the Public Affairs Institute.

Another sponsor is Charles A. Murray. He is on the Federal pay roll, or was a short time ago.

Another sponsor is Wendell Berge, formerly Assistant Attorney General. He was on the Federal pay roll for a long time. Do Senators know what job he had? Let me tell my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] that Mr. Berge was at the head of the Antitrust Division for 11½ long years, and finally when the Republicans came in and I became chairman of the Civil Service Committee I asked him to appear before our committee one day. I said, "Mr. Berge, how long have you been at the head of the Antitrust Division?" He said, "Eleven and a half years." I said, "Name to this committee one man you sent to jail, or one corporation that was punished for violating the antitrust laws." He could not name one. For 11½ years he had been at the head of the Antitrust Division, drawing an enormous salary. He felt so ashamed when we got through with him that he went over to the Attorney General's Office and resigned. He should have resigned 11½ years before. Now we find him as one of the sponsors of the Public Affairs Institute, trying to fool the Negroes.

Another sponsor is John M. Coffee. He has a Federal job in the State of Washington.

Clifford J. Durr is another sponsor. As I remember, he had a job on the Federal Trade Commission for a long time and drew down a large Federal salary. He has been off the Federal pay roll for a little while, and now he is a sponsor of the Public Affairs Institute trying to fool the Negro, too.

Leon Henderson is another sponsor. We all remember Leon. Here he is again. Now he is one of the sponsors of the Public Affairs Institute. Yes, they are going to save the Negro for sure this time. They did not save him in 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938, 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944, 1945, 1946, 1947, 1948, or 1949. But in 1950, on January 9, 1950, they are going to start all over again, and this time they are going to save the Negroes for sure.

Then here is our old friend Maury Maverick, of Texas. I do not need to say anything about him.

Another sponsor is Culbert Olson, elected on the Democratic ticket to be Governor of California, and he made such a poor job of it that he was not reelected, and thereupon was given a Federal job. Here he is, as a sponsor of the Public Affairs Institute.

And here we find as a sponsor one of the Roosevelt boys, Jimmy Roosevelt. It always looks nice on a piece of stationery to have the name of one of the Roosevelt boys appear on it. There are three or four of them. Any one of them can be used as a sponsor whenever a sponsor is needed. Jimmy appears as a sponsor in this case. He is going to save the Negroes, just as his father was going to save them in 1933.

Then, of course, there appears the name of our old friend Aubrey Williams, who comes from Alabama. Aubrey Williams is the one who said that the farmers of North Dakota could till their farms with a unit consisting of a horse and an ox. He said a horse and an ox could pull a plow anywhere in North Dakota. He said a team would be enough for that purpose. This farm expert is now a sponsor for the Public Affairs Institute. Everyone in the State of North Dakota knows that the least number of horses needed to pull a plow is five. But Aubrey Williams under the NRA fixed the unit to pull a plow as an ox and a horse. He also limited the number of cows and chickens on the farm. While I was Governor of North Dakota I came to Washington in an endeavor to have the allotment increased, so the farmer could grow a larger crop.

Mr. President, I shall not read all the names of the sponsors. The list is a long one. I shall now read what they said in their letter to me, which represents the greatest confession of failure of the Democratic Party from 1933 up to the present time. This is what they say in their letter:

My Dear Senator—

The letter is written to me—

The startling revelation of the Joint Committee on the Economic Report on the point of the low-income families shocked us.

Mr. President, just think of it. The Democrats have been in office 18 years, and under the Democratic administration there are more than 2,000,000 employees in the Government. Some of those who are sponsors of the Public Affairs Institute were heads of departments, some of which employed more than 100,000 persons. They now for the first time find out all about these low-income families and they say they are shocked. Mr. President, I think they should be shocked. I want to show what the Democratic Party did after 18 years of rule, according to their own report. Mind you, I did not write the matter from which I am about to read. It was written by Democrats. I will read what these men who have been drawing down huge salaries say. I repeat that one of the men who is a sponsor was formerly Governor of California, Culbert Olson. He is one of those who 18 or 19 years ago told the Negroes how he was going to help them.

Mr. President, I want to make it plain again that the senior Senator from North Dakota has voted for measures which would be of help to the Negroes every time such measures have been brought before the Senate. I was one of the few Senators who would not vote for the resolution which provided that 64 Senators had to sign a petition for cloture, before action could be taken. I defy any Senator upon this floor to find one time when the senior Senator from North Dakota did not vote for measures which would be of help to the underprivileged, whether Negroes or whites.

I am sick and tired of all the hypocrisy, of all the sham which has been exhibited. There was in office as President of the United States one man for a period of 16 years. Then his successor, also a Democrat, has been in office 3 or 4 years. Yet nothing has been done for the poorer people, or less than nothing.

When Mr. Roosevelt became President, within two blocks of the Capitol there were slums which were a disgrace to humanity. Now 17 or 18 years later they are still there. The Democratic Party was going to wipe out the slums. We heard all the beautiful speeches which were made to that effect. We heard speeches which told how the poor people were suffering, how in these slums the water supply was so close to the toilets that the poor people living in the slum dwellings were drinking polluted water and becoming sick with typhoid fever. It was said that if the Democrats were put in power such water pipes would be moved away from the toilets a certain number of feet so there would not be the danger of typhoid fever any more. Yet, after 18 years, those pipes are still there. The slums still exist within two blocks of our Capitol. Oh, the Democrats are going into every country in the world, saving the people everywhere, all over, at the four corners of the earth, and yet within two blocks of our own Capitol the slums are worse than ever. That, in spite of this great Democratic Party.

This is what is said by the men I have named, Leon Henderson, Hugh B. Mitchell, John M. Carmody, Culbert Olson, James Roosevelt, and all the others of them:

The Lower Third Described and Characterized.

In other words, we still have them all. It was at one time the lower third. Now it has increased. When the Republicans were voted out of power one-third of the population was underprivileged. Now, after 18 years of Democratic rule the number has increased to 40 percent. The number has gone up instead of down. I am reading from page 13 of the pamphlet entitled "The Lower Third":

The committee's own data reveals that one-half of all families headed by persons over 64 years of age received less than $2,000 income in 1949. More than a fourth of such families received less than $1,000 income. Even more significant, these old-age families account for nearly one-quarter of all low-income families.

That is their own record, Mr. President. One would figure that the Democrats would be so ashamed of the situation that now exists that they would be glad to vote for a civil-rights bill submitted by the senior Senator from North Dakota. One would figure the Democrats would not have the gall to stand up on the Senate floor and move to table the civil-rights measure.

Moreover, nearly a half of all families headed by women of working age had incomes of less than $2,000 a year.

They have the women working, Mr. President, in this great Democratic family. I continue to read:

Moreover, nearly a half of all families headed by women of working age had incomes of less than $2,000 a year. * * * More than 700,000 of these family heads were not even in the labor force at the time of the survey.

They do not even have a job.

Now, Mr. President, let us come to the Negroes, for whom the Democratic Party cries and cries, shedding crocodile tears. What is stated in this pamphlet about my friend the Negro, Mr. President? I read further from the pamphlet:

The Negro's position is very clear from the committee's data. Among the low-income nonfarm families headed by persons of working age in 1948, one of every five was nonwhite, predominantly Negro.

Mr. President, mind you, I am quoting the Democrats themselves. No Republican wrote this book. If we examine the list of sponsors, we find no Republican among them. So far as I know, there is not a Republican among them.

I read further from the committee's statement:

There are about 1,000,000 Negro families living in our cities—

Listen to this, Mr. President, and then let the Democrats hang their heads in shame—on incomes that do not permit of anything above bare subsistence.

Mr. President, because I see the majority leader, the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], here now, I wish to state again that the pamphlet from which I am reading is a report made by Democrats, including Leon Henderson, Jimmy Roosevelt, and all the others of a new organization, just set up, called the Public Affairs Institute. This report came off the press in January 1950. They say:

There are about 1,000,000 Negro families living in our cities on incomes that do not permit of anything above bare subsistence.

Imagine that, Mr. President. The Democrats themselves say the Negroes are in that position after 18 years of Democratic rule.

But then the Democrats in the Senate say that when a Senator tries on the floor of the Senate to secure the enactment of some legislation for the benefit of Negroes, the amendments he offers for that purpose should be tabled, when, as a matter of fact, the Democrats know that the only way to secure the enactment of such legislation is to have it enacted now, or else it never will be enacted at this session.

Mr. President, let me point out that one of the Democratic-controlled committees had one of these bills all last session, all during the first half of the present Congress. Yet that bill has not been reported as of today. How can anyone tell me that the committees will report an anti-poll-tax bill, when that bill has been tied up in committee for over a year.

Mr. President, the report from which I have been reading says that a million Negro families are on the verge of starvation. Think of that, Mr. President, after 18 years of Democratic rule.

A little while ago I saw a picture—in Life magazine, I believe—showing that in Harlem a Negro woman had to use a club to keep the rats off little children so the rats would not bite the children while they were sleeping.

This Democratic report then says:

Consider this comparison between white and colored families: In families headed by white males of working age only one out of nine had incomes of less than $2,000; but in similar families headed by nonwhites nearly two-fifths had incomes of less than $2,000.

Listen to this statement; and I point out that to this Democratic committee the statement was not even sufficiently important to be printed in large black type:

The causes of differences between whites and Negroes in income, occupation, health, living standards, cultural attainment, etc., are well known and have been so adequately described in the scientific literature as to require no elaborate comment here. It is sufficient to remark that the unique factor which is added to the other causes of poverty common to all groups is denial of equal occupational opportunity to colored people.

After 18 years of Democratic rule, Mr. President, mind you, after the time when the Democrats had a majority of over 3 to 1 in the House of Representatives, and after they had, here in the Senate, 80 Senators, as compared to 16 Republican Senators, after 18 years when the Democrats could write any kind of law they wanted to write, that is the result—after 18 years of Democratic rule.

Mr. President, now, when I have offered some amendments to help the colored people, some amendments which at last give the Senate an opportunity to be heard on the subject of civil rights, we find the distinguished Democratic Senator from Arkansas moving to lay this amendment on the table. Every Democrat on the other side of the aisle but one—the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN]—voted to do that.

O Mr. President, they say the amendment is not germane to the bill which is before the Senate. They say, "We are considering oleomargarine." Since when, Mr. President, did oleomargarine become more important than human lives? Since when did oleomargarine become more important than little children who are dying? Let Senators look at the mortality rates in some of the slums. But the Democratic Party's members here in the Senate say, with only one member of their ranks voting against them: "We have had this matter up for 25 years. We have never gotten a vote on it, and it will not be voted on today. We will take it up some time later." That may be 1 month or 2 months or 3 months. But they simply say, "later." Of course, Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] said this morning that later, when it is brought up, a filibuster will result. If we are going to have a filibuster, let us have it at the beginning of the session. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to stay here every day and every night until we come to a conclusion on this matter which Mr. Edgar G. Brown, of Chicago, says has been pending for 25 years without ever having been voted on by the Congress.

Mr. President, the second session of the Eighty-first Congress met almost a month ago; but the anti-poll-tax bill still sleeps in committee.

I hold in my hand a copy of the Democratic platform for 1948. When the Democratic Party was looking for votes, it sang another tune. When the Democrats wanted votes from the Negroes, this is what they said in their platform. Mr. President, to save time, I now ask unanimous consent to have the civil-rights plank of the 1948 Democratic platform printed at this point in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the Senator also place in the RECORD, at the same time, the Republican platform?

Mr. LANGER. No; I will let the Senator from Illinois, my friend, place it in the RECORD. I am nonpartisan. Why should I not let the Senator from Illinois place it in the RECORD?

Mr. LUCAS. I thought the Senator from North Dakota was elected on the Republican ticket.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I decline to yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOWNEY in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LUCAS. I have no objection. The Senator from North Dakota really pays a compliment to the Democratic Party by putting that part of the Democratic platform in the RECORD.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois knows that no one was more critical than I of what the Republican Party did not do in the last Congress. They pledged themselves to do this, that, and the other thing for the Negroes, but they did not do it. I stood upon this floor time after time and said so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

There being no objection, the plank referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Democratic national platform for 1948]

The Democratic Party is responsible for the great civil-rights gains made in recent years in eliminating unfair and illegal discrimination based on race, creed, or color.

The Democratic Party commits itself to continuing its efforts to eradicate all racial, religious, and economic discrimination.

We again state our belief that racial and religious minorities must have the right to live, the right to work, the right to vote, the full and equal protection of the laws, on a basis of equality with all citizens as guaranteed by the Constitution.

We highly commend President Harry S. Truman for his courageous stand on the issue of civil rights. We call upon the Congress to support our President in guaranteeing these basic and fundamental rights—

(1) The right of full and equal political participation;

(2) The right to equal opportunity of employment;

(3) The right of security of person;

(4) The right of equal treatment in the service and defense of our Nation.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, to satisfy my friend, the Senator from Illinois, I shall read the Republican platform of 2 years ago. I have a copy of it before me, too. The Republican Party said at that time:

Lynching or any other form of mob violence anywhere is a disgrace to any civilized state, and we favor the prompt enactment of legislation to end this infamy.

One of the basic principles of this Republic is the equality of all individuals in their right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. This principle is enunciated in the Declaration of Independence and embodied in the Constitution of the United States; it was vindicated on the field of battle and became the cornerstone of this Republic. This right of equal opportunity to work and to advance in life—should never be limited in any individual because of race, religion, color, or country of origin. We favor the enactment and just enforcement of such Federal legislation as may be necessary to maintain this right at all times in every part of this Republic.

We favor the abolition of the poll tax as a requisite to voting.

We are opposed to the idea of racial segregation in the armed services of the United States.

Mr. President, I want to be sure that it is understood that that is the statement of the Republican Party, and that it is not confused with the statements or platforms of the Democratic Party, because they are so much alike. However, neither one of the two parties kept their promises in their platforms. But I have just read from the Republican platform of 1948.

Then, of course, the Democrats offered to help the Indians, too. But the Indians were poorer, when the Democrats got through than when they started; and today they are far, far worse off than they were 18 years ago.

But, Mr. President, I wish to say that during the Eightieth Congress the Republican Party did not have the Presidency. As everyone knows, the Republicans have not had a President since 1933. So in the last analysis, the final responsibility is upon the Democratic Party, because, as I have said, there has been a Democrat as President during all this time.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. LANGER. No. I decline to yield, because I have only a short time left. I did not request the distinguished Senator to yield this morning, when he was talking, and I have so much to say about what the Democratic Party did not do, which they promised to do, that I simply do not have time to yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LANGER. We come next to schools. I repeat this. The distinguished Senator was not present when I read the names of some of the sponsors of the Public Affairs Institute: John M. Carmody, who is a pay-roller; Hugh B. Mitchell, who was a pay-roller; Charles A. Murray who is a pay-roller; Wendell Berge, who was a pay-roller; John M. Coffee, who was a Democratic pay-roller. They are all Democrats. Clifford J. Durr, who was a Democratic pay-roller; Leon Henderson, who was a Democratic pay-roller; Maury Maverick, of Texas; Culbert Olson, of California; Jimmy Roosevelt—he is merely on it for good measure—and of course, Aubrey Williams—all sponsors of the Institute of Public Affairs. Now, after 18 years, they are going to save the Negro, and, I imagine, the poor whites. Here is what they have to say about education:

While schooling may not correlate perfectly with the occupational achievement and income, there can be no serious doubt of the so-called money value of schools. Few, again, see the necessity of possessing more than the rudiments of knowledge in making any appreciable headway in the workaday world. For the variety of incomes that are above the average incomes and stations, special preparation in educational institutions is the essential way of broadening skills and credentials that enable the recipient to perform.

I merely want to say, Mr. President, that the Democratic Party did such a poor job in helping out nationally on the matter of education that, when World War II broke out, roughly 800,000 young boys could not even pass the educational test required to get into the Army. The Democrats made the examination very simple. They said, "Is this a ball?" and they held up a ball. They then held up a square, and they would say, "Is this a square?" Eight hundred thousand of the boys could not pass the examination to get into the Army. They could not tell a square from a ball. That may seem farfetched. Many people may think it untrue, yet that is the record as disclosed upon the floor of the Senate.

This morning I heard some Senators say I was not sincere in offering these amendments. We shall find out who is sincere. Right now, I move that the Senate consider on the first Monday in February the bill (S. 1728) to prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, color, religion, or national origin, the so-called FEPC bill.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. I suggest the motion is out of order. There is something else pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the motion is out of order at this time.

Mr. LANGER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LANGER. When will the motion be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the objection goes rather to the form than to the time.

Mr. LANGER. Then I move that the Senate proceed to consider the bill (S. 1728), known as the FEPC bill, immediately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion is in order.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I move to lay the motion on the table, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LANGER. I did not yield for a quorum, but I yield on condition that, by unanimous consent, I do not lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the Senator. What was the last remark?

Mr. LANGER. I did not yield for the calling of a quorum, but I have no objection to the calling of a quorum, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the Senator has already lost the floor.

Mr. LANGER. Then I ask unanimous consent that I may have it when we reconvene.

Mr. LUCAS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hill	Millikin
Anderson	Hoey	Mundt
Benton	Holland	Murray
Bridges	Humphrey	Myers
Butler	Jenner	Neely
Cain	Johnson, Colo.	O'Conor
Capehart	Johnson, Tex.	O'Mahoney

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DOWNEY in the chair). A quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] to take up the FEPC bill, which is Calendar No. 1211.

The clerk will state the bill by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1728) to prohibit discrimination in employment because of race, color, religion, or national origin.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Chair kindly restate the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] to take up the FEPC bill, which has just been stated by title.

On this question the Senator from North Dakota asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll, and several Senators voted when their names were called.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, is a parliamentary inquiry in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. MILLIKIN. What is the business before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is voting on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to lay upon the table the motion of the Senator from North Dakota that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the FEPC bill.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Independently of what had been the pending business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. TAFT. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TAFT. As I understand, if the motion of the Senator from North Dakota should prevail, it would displace the oleo bill and return it to the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the motion made by the Senator from North Dakota should not be laid upon the table, what the Senator has stated would be the result.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. AIKEN. If the motion to lay on the table shall be defeated, then the Senate will have an opportunity to debate the motion to make the FEPC bill the pending business, and displace the oleo bill temporarily; will it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion would be debatable at that time.

Mr. AIKEN. But if the motion to lay on the table shall prevail, then any discussion as to bringing up the FEPC bill would be out the window; would it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would not be in order.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, if this motion should prevail, what would happen to the oleo bill? Would the Senate resume consideration of the oleo bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator restate his question?

Mr. MILLIKIN. If the motion of the Senator from Illinois should prevail, namely, to table the motion to proceed to the consideration of the FEPC bill, would the Senate then automatically go back to the oleo bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is correct.

Mr. MILLIKIN. If the motion shall not prevail, then we will go ahead with the FEPC bill, independent of the oleo bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to consider it would then be debatable.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Under the latter alternative, what would be the status of the oleo bill? Would that go back on the calendar, to come up on separate motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate would have before it the consideration of the motion of the Senator from North Dakota to make the FEPC bill the order of business. If that were agreed to, then the oleo bill would go back to the calendar.

The clerk will resume the call of the roll.

The legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. MCCARTHY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], who is necessarily absent. If he were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senators from Virginia [Mr. BYRD and Mr. ROBERTSON] are attending the inauguration of Hon. John S. Battle as Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia and are therefore necessarily absent.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] are absent on official business as members of a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Works, holding hearings on various flood-control and public-works projects in the State of New Mexico.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. HUNT], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCMAHON] are absent on important public business.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], who is absent by leave of the Senate, is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], who is absent on official business. If present and voting, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] would vote "nay" and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] would vote "yea."

The Senator from New York [Mr. IVES] is absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] is necessarily absent. If present and voting, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] would vote "nay."

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] is absent on official business.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DARBY], and the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] are detained on official business. If present and voting, the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. DARBY] would each vote "yea."

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] is absent on official business. If present and voting, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 59, nays 17, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. LUCAS to lay on the table Mr. LANGER'S motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] relating to the poll tax.

The amendment offered by Mr. LANGER is as follows:

On page 5, line 3, to strike out the word "This" and insert in lieu thereof "The foregoing provisions of this."

On page 5, after line 6, to add the following new sections:

"SEC. . The requirement that a poll tax be paid as a prerequisite to voting or registering to vote at primaries or other elections for President, Vice President, electors for President, or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, is not and shall not be deemed a qualification of voters or electors voting or registering to vote at primaries or other elections for said officers, within the meaning of the Constitution, but is and shall be deemed an interference with the manner of holding primaries and other elections for said national officers and a tax upon the right or privilege of voting for said national officers.

"SEC. . It shall be unlawful for any State, municipality, or other government or governmental subdivision to prevent any person from voting or registering to vote in any primary or other election for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, on the ground that such person has not paid a poll tax, and any such requirement shall be invalid and void insofar as it purports to disqualify any person otherwise qualified to vote in such primary or other election. No State, municipality, or other government or governmental subdivision shall levy a poll tax or any other tax on the right or privilege of voting in such primary or other election, and any such tax shall be invalid and void insofar as it purports to disqualify any person otherwise qualified from voting at such primary or other election.

"SEC. . It shall be unlawful for any State, municipality, or other government or governmental subdivision to interfere with the manner of selecting persons for national office by requiring the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting or registering to vote in any primary or other election for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, and any such requirement shall be invalid and void.

"SEC. . It shall be unlawful for any person, whether or not acting under the cover of authority of the laws of any State or subdivision thereof, to require the payment of a poll tax as a prerequisite for voting or registering to vote in any primary or other election for President, Vice President, electors for President or Vice President, or for Senator or Member of the House of Representatives."

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I move to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, may we have the amendment stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the poll-tax amendment, a rather lengthy amendment, which has heretofore been read. Does the Senator desire to have it repeated?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I think the statement of the Vice President is sufficient.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCARTHY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON], who is necessarily absent. If he were present and voting he would vote "yea." If I were permitted to vote I would vote "nay."

So Mr. FULBRIGHT's motion to lay on the table Mr. LANGER's amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments to be offered, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, there is an amendment on the table which I ask to have read. The amendment was offered by me for myself and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. McCARTHY]. Since I offered the amendment I have added an additional paragraph.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the proper place in the bill it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. . (a) Effective on and after the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of enactment of this act—

(1) the tax imposed by section 1700 (a) of the Internal Revenue Code (tax on admissions);

(2) the tax imposed by section 3406 (a) (10) of such code (tax on electric light bulbs and tubes);

(3) the tax imposed by section 2400 of such code (tax on jewelry);

(4) the tax imposed by section 2401 of such code (tax on furs);

(5) the tax imposed by section 2402 of such code (tax on toilet preparations);

(6) the tax imposed by section 3465 (a) of such code (taxes on telegraph, telephone, radio, and cable facilities); and

(7) the taxes imposed by section 3469 of such code (taxes on transportation of persons, and on seating or sleeping accommodations in connection with such transportation); shall be determined without regard to the war tax rates specified in section 1650 of such code.

(b) Effective on and after the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of enactment of this act, section 1651 of the Internal Revenue Code (retailers' excise tax on luggage, purses, handbags, toilet cases, etc.) is hereby repealed.

(c) Effective on and after the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of enactment of this act, section 3406 (a) (4) of the Internal Revenue Code (manufacturers' excise tax on photographic apparatus) is hereby amended by striking out "25 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "10 percent," and by striking out "15 percent" and inserting in lieu thereof "10 percent."

(d) For the purposes of section 1657 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to floor stocks refunds on electric light bulbs) and of section 1658 of such code (relating to the application of the effective date of rate reduction in the case of telephone, telegraph, etc., services) the term "rate reduction date" means the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of enactment of this act.

(e) Effective on and after the first day of the first month which begins more than 20 days after the date of enactment of this act, section 3475 of the Internal Revenue Code (tax on transportation of property) is hereby repealed.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield so I may make a short statement?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield if I do not lose the floor thereby.

Mr. LUCAS. I assure the Senator he will not lose the floor. I simply wanted to make a statement to advise Senators that we are going to try to make disposition of this amendment before we recess. I hope Senators will not leave the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the language of the amendment which has just been read is identical with that which is sometimes referred to as the Johnson of Colorado amendment, with the exception of the addition of the amendment previously offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] with reference to the tax on transportation. In preparing the amendment I have made no change in the Johnson amendment with the exception of the addition of the Cordon amendment.

The changes provided by this amendment affect admissions, electric-light bulbs, furs, jewelry, luggage, toilet preparations, communications, transportation of persons, and photographic apparatus. In the case of admissions, furs, most jewelry, and toilet preparations the rate would be reduced from 20 percent to 10 percent. Watches selling at retail for not more than $65, and alarm clocks selling for not more than $5, which are now taxed at 10 percent, would continue to carry the 10-percent rate.

The rate on electric-light bulbs would be reduced from 20 percent down to 5 percent. The tax on transportation of persons would be reduced from 15 percent to 10 percent.

I might say in that connection that the tax on transportation is very unfair, as I found recently in making a trip to a place in United States Territory, the Virgin Islands, to visit which one must pay a tax on transportation, whereas if one buys transportation to the Bahamas, to Trinidad, or some other islands not in American possession, but in the same area, one pays no tax.

In the case of luggage, the retailers' excise tax of 20 percent is eliminated entirely, and in its place, the manufacturers' tax of 10 percent is restored. This manufacturers' tax applies to fewer articles than does the present retailers' excise tax. For example, it does not apply to ladies' handbags but is restricted only to trunks, valises, traveling bags, suitcases, hat boxes for use by travelers, fitted toilet cases, and other travelers' luggage, and leather and imitation leather brief cases.

The tax rates on photographic equipment have been especially burdensome and have apparently sharply reduced sales and employment in that vital industry. The tax on cameras and camera equipment was particularly high—25 percent—and was imposed early in the war for the primary purpose of discouraging civilians from purchasing such equipment at a time when the national defense needed virtually the entire output of the industry. By the terms of my amendment, the present 25-percent rate on cameras and camera equipment, and the 15-percent rate on films, would both be reduced to 10 percent.

Last year when this proposal was under consideration by the committee, the revenue loss on an annual basis was computed to be about $628,000,000. The category in which the largest single loss of revenue occurs is admissions. The admissions tax is primarily a tax on the average man when he goes to inexpensive places of amusement, such as motion picture theaters. In my judgment, this tax is particularly objectionable, since it is paid very largely by the poor man, not by the rich man.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not feel that my proposal is merely an attempt to load down the oleomargarine bill with amendments. This question of revising the excise-tax structure has been before us for several years now, but the Congress has never had a real chance to vote on the question. If my amendment is rejected, there is no guaranty at all, other than the statement which has just been made to us by the majority leader, that we shall have another chance to vote on excise-tax reduction at this session of Congress.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. I should like to associate myself with the Senator from Nebraska on this amendment, in view of the fact that on April 27 of last year, I submitted an amendment very much the same as this one. I should like to solicit from the Senator from Nebraska his opinion as to whether he shares with me the fear that if we fail to enact this excise-tax relief at this time, it may be the only opportunity we shall have at this session of Congress to have a clear-cut decision on whether or not to decrease the excise taxes.

Mr. BUTLER. I very definitely share that fear.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield further?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. We have heard reports emanating from the other side of the aisle that there will be an opportunity at this session of Congress to vote on excise taxes, which is an altogether different prophecy, of course, from the statement that we shall be given an opportunity to vote on these precise taxes at this session, without having attached thereto proposed new taxes or taxes in other areas.

So it seems to me that those of us in the Senate who are desirous of reducing excise taxes at this session of Congress, without increasing taxes in some other area, have this one opportunity, and this one only, that they can be assured of, to so register their views.

Mr. BUTLER. I thank the Senator, I share with him the fear that if the amendment is not adopted at this time, we shall not have an opportunity to vote on this matter again for another year, which is quite a long time.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, this amendment is almost identical to one incorporated in the Wiley amendment, except it includes the Cordon amendment, which was rejected by a vote of 33 to 58, as I recall, the day before yesterday.

It was discussed at considerable length, as the Senator well knows. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], chairman of the Finance Committee, assured the Senate that this approach is the best one by which not to secure a reduction in the excise taxes.

I can assure the Senate, particularly those who seem to be so desirous of reducing taxes, that this amendment is not the best way of doing so.

There are many other Senators who have expressed themselves on the floor of the Senate as desiring to secure a reduction in taxes. The chairman of the Finance Committee assured us that we can later reach a vote on a bill, now on the calendar, which does involve a direct, out-and-out reduction of excise taxes. Since we have had so much discussion of it, it would seem to me to be quite proper——

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold the motion which I assume he is about to make? I should like, if I may, to have the privilege of saying a few words on this subject.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I shall withhold it, if I may have the understanding that I shall have the floor later to make the motion. I do not wish to lose an opportunity to make the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will have to yield the floor in order for the Senator from Ohio to take it. The Chair will give consideration to the Senator from Arkansas, if he is on his feet seeking recognition.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Very well; I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I have consistently voted against amendments to the oleomargarine-tax-repeal bill which I thought would in any way block the passage of the bill. However, in my opinion, there is no reason to believe that this amendment will do so, particularly in view of the fact that the bill which is the basis of this amendment was actually reported favorably to the Senate by the Finance Committee as long ago as July 11. It has been on the calendar for 6 months. Yet the majority leadership has not seen fit to call up the bill.

If the pending bill goes to the House of Representatives with this amendment attached to it, inasmuch as the House leaders have stated that they are in favor of a reduction of excise taxes, then if they are prepared to add such a provision to another bill, that will be quite all right with me. In such case, I think the Senate can recede in the conference from this excise-tax-reduction amendment.

But it seems to me our hands are tied unless we act now. This question has been before us, and it has been before the House of Representatives. So far, the House of Representatives has refused to take action on it. Apparently the House intends to act on it only in common with a number of other provisions regarding taxation.

Mr. President, it seems to me that if we wish to request the House of Representatives to take immediate action on it, this is the best way to do so. I am not sure the House of Representatives will not accept this excise-tax-reduction amendment as a part of the oleomargarine tax-repeal bill. I am not sure that the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives will not give a rule for the consideration and adoption of the amendments as we in the Senate may adopt them to this bill, including the excise-tax-reduction amendment.

But if that is not done in the House of Representatives, at least the House will have the choice of passing a separate excise-tax-reduction bill and sending it to the Senate.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the industries which are affected by excise taxes will find that their sales of merchandise will practically cease from the time when it is agreed in Congress that excise taxes shall be reduced. That will be true in regard to the sale of jewelry and other articles affected by the excise taxes, because the people will wait for the cuts in excise taxes to come.

So, Mr. President, if we do not take this action today, I do not think we shall get any such excise-tax-reduction bill from the House of Representatives until July or until such time as the various industries are seriously affected.

Mr. President, I am not in favor of in any way hampering the oleo-tax-repeal bill, except as it may be delayed for perhaps a week or two in the House of Representatives while the subject matter of this amendment is fought out.

Therefore I propose to vote for the amendment to repeal the excise taxes.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not care to argue this question. This amendment is the one way not to secure any legislation on the reduction of excise taxes at this session of Congress.

The other day I stated to the Senate—clearly, I hope—that it is very unfair to send a bill, including an amendment of this character, to the Agricultural Committee of the House of Representatives, from which conferees would be appointed. It is very unfair to the Senate Finance Committee. It is very unfair to all of us who have any responsibility for the fiscal affairs of the Nation.

If this amendment is adopted as a part of this bill, the conferees will consist of a number from the Senate Finance Committee and a number from the House of Representatives Committee on Agriculture, if the bill ever gets to that point. It makes no difference whether the committee wishes to strike out these excise taxes without considering other taxes. Certainly when a responsible conference committee is called on to give consideration to the possibility of raising additional taxes, we ought to have the advice and counsel of the able men on the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives who, through long years of experience, have studied tax problems.

This amendment will cost the Government more than a billion dollars. We already have a deficit of $5,500,000,000 for this fiscal year. The President in his message estimated the deficit for the next fiscal year at $5,133,000,000.

The amendment is not the way to obtain tax reduction, Mr. President. This amendment certainly is not the way to encourage hope of securing the enactment of any legislation dealing with the repeal of the oleomargarine tax.

Therefore I hope the Senate will reject the amendment.

The items considered by the Senate Finance Committee, and which now are included in a bill on the calendar, would cost the Treasury $670,000,000. The repeal of the tax on freight alone would cost the Treasury $330,000,000. So the total loss under this amendment, if it should be adopted, would be at least $1,000,000,000.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Let me inquire how different is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska from the bill reported last fall by the Senator's committee?

Mr. GEORGE. In part it is the same bill, but it includes additional features, particularly as regards the freight tax. The repeal of that tax alone will cause the Treasury to lose more than $330,000,000.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. The President did recommend last year, as I remember, that the freight tax be removed.

Mr. GEORGE. He did, but he also recommended that there be some compensatory taxes. I do not commit myself to compensatory taxes. But as a responsible Member of the Senate, viewing the fiscal status of the Government, I do commit myself to have an open mind and a fair chance to try to balance the budget and to try to begin payments on the national debt. I know this amendment is the way to defeat every intelligent effort to secure excise-tax reduction at this time. Of course, it is obvious, I think, that if it should have that effect, it would also jeopardize any action upon the oleomargarine bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. The oleo tax bill, without this amendment attached, would go to conference, with members selected from the Agricultural Committee of the House and from the Finance Committee of the Senate, in any case, would it not?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, that is where it would go, and the Agricultural Committee certainly would claim jurisdiction in the House. We would not have the advantage of a committee of 25 men who for a long, long period of years have given study to tax problems.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not suppose the Senator can answer the question, but I wonder how the pending bill happened to miss the Ways and Means Committee in the first place?

Mr. GEORGE. For more than 45 years, legislation affecting oleomargarine has been handled by the Agricultural Committee of the House. That is why it missed it. It never has been considered a tax matter. The Senator's amendment is not really germane under any strict construction because the oleomargarine tax was imposed confessedly as a regulatory matter, and the principal burden of the oleomargarine tax lies in a license tax or occupation tax, rather than in an excise tax.

Mr. BUTLER. I should also like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance, whether his attitude would be a little more favorable to the proposal, if the tax on transportation, which is now included in the amendment, were eliminated? That would reduce the loss to the Treasury by $330,000,000, the Senator says.

Mr. GEORGE. It would be better on the Treasury, but the committee has already voted on the question of the tax on freight, which, as a matter of fact, presents one of the most meritorious cases for the lifting of the tax. I am not against the lifting of the excise taxes. Many months ago I said they should be lifted. There is a bill on the calendar, very high up on the calendar, known as House bill 3905, which deals with these specific taxes, and that calendar number can be taken up on motion at any time. If it is not taken up with the agreement of the leaders on this side, I myself propose, as I have already stated, to move to take it up at some reasonably early date.

I wish first of all to have a further conference with the Ways and Means Committee of the House in the interest of greater harmony, because if there is not some cooperation between the two houses, we shall be unable to do what a great many of us desire to do, and that is to eliminate or substantially reduce many of the wartime excise taxes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska for a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. The proposal would reduce the tax to 10 percent. It would cut it generally from 20 percent to 10 percent, which is perhaps as much as the Senator contemplated in the reduction of excise taxes at this period, anyway. So I do not see that it is at all out of reason. The question, when it finally comes, is going to be whether we shall have a complete repeal, or merely a reduction in the excise tax. In this case we are only asking for about a 50 percent reduction.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, I understand. If we want to repeal all the wartime excise taxes, it would mean a loss to the Treasury of about two billion, three hundred, or four hundred million dollars. This amendment would deplete the Treasury—that is, upon the present basis—to the extent of about one billion dollars in round figures. My position is taken not because I am opposing the removal of the taxes; but because I know, that if we take this course, we foredoom any reasonable hope of a tax-reduction program at this session of the Congress.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Does not the Senator think that if this question comes up independently, before we get through with the specific excise tax bill, we will have reduced these taxes by $1,500,000,000, instead of only $1,000,000,000, as proposed in this amendment, or $900,000,000, or whatever the figure may be?

Mr. GEORGE. I think so.

Mr. TAFT. Does not the Senator think that, on the whole, it might be better to take this lump-sum reduction as proposed by the amendment, rather than to have it come later?

Mr. GEORGE. No. This is not a way by which any relief whatever can be had against excise taxes, and it is not the way by which the effort to obtain relief should be undertaken. We certainly ought not to preclude the taxing committee of the other House from some real consideration and participation in the matter, because there is a second step, namely, whether we are to raise additional taxes, and there also remains the question whether this is a sufficient reduction. All these matters are so intimately related that I think we ought not to proceed in this way. I do not propose to make a motion to table, but I earnestly request that the Senate proceed to vote upon the amendment as quickly as possible. I hope it will be rejected.

Mr. FULBRIGHT obtained the floor.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a minute so that I may ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. I appreciate the graciousness of both Senators in allowing me to ask a question of the Senator from Georgia. It is not germane to the present discussion, but it bears on the matter of taxes and the President's request for new taxes, and the income of the Federal Government. As the Senator knows, I have been deeply interested in the subject of bringing the tax laws into line so that the motto inscribed in imperishable granite over the Supreme Court, "Equal justice under the law," might be even more than a statement in cold stone, and instead might become a living force in our country's financial affairs. I am referring to a bill which is in the Finance Committee of the Senate, a bill which I caused to be introduced more than a year ago, whereby a remedy may be found for a very pressing problem. Throughout the country, there are so-called charitable trusts, which are milking the honest taxpayers of hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars, by those who are escaping taxation by finesse. The legislation which I have introduced seeks to correct that evil. I have talked to the Senator from Georgia and also to my colleague from Colorado, and every time the question is asked, I get the answer, "It must originate in the Ways and Means Committee of the House." That sounds good to me, but in another way, when I go to the House Committee on Ways and Means, I find it difficult to get action. The question I now propound to the Senator from Georgia is this: Here is a crying need. It relates to a phony situation in the tax mechanics, whereby clever and dishonest men are evading their just share of honest taxes. How am I, a Senator from New Hampshire, who bears this matter in his heart as a real problem, going to get justice for the taxpayers of America, through either of the great committees of the House and Senate, who have these matters in charge? Will the Senator advise me in friendly intercourse and relationship, about it? Must I leave it with these committees, or should I adopt the suggestion made by the distinguished Senator from Georgia, and wait for the time when his bill (H. R. 8935) comes on the floor, which he is going to call up, and then seek to amend it with my proposed legislation here on the floor? I should rather do it through hearings, and have this matter expounded and shown up to the country at large, and acquire some good will and momentum behind it. But I am a disappointed soul, traveling around in this great vast area on Capitol Hill under a sense of frustration and getting nowhere fast. Therefore, I ask the Senator to help me out of my slough of despondency, to lift me out of the miry legislative and parliamentary clay, and put my feet on a rock foundation, in order that justice may triumph over injustice.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall undertake to do so, as fast and as speedily as possible. I can assure the Senator that he would be at liberty to offer an amendment, but the problem to which he has referred is complicated. A very technical amendment would have to be drawn to do what the Senator wants to do, and not do too much. It is a highly technical and complicated problem, action on which should be based on testimony taken in hearings. However, any tax program which may come before the Senate from the House this year dealing with any technical or administrative provisions of the act would certainly be an appropriate place for the amendment which the Senator from New Hampshire desires to offer.

I may say to the Senator that at some interval in the hearing on social security—I would not want to suspend social security in midair indefinitely, because I know he will agree with me that that is an important bill, too—but at some interval in the social-security hearing, the Finance Committee will be pleased to give the opportunity for a hearing on the bill which the Senator has introduced, because it is a bill of the technical character I have indicated, upon which a hearing should be held.

Mr. TOBEY. I thank the Senator in all sincerity, but I wonder whether the Senator is aware of one provision in my proposed legislation, which I think ought to meet with universal approval, regardless of party. It is the provision which requires all these trusts, good, bad, and indifferent, to be registered with the Department of Commerce or with the Department of the Treasury, with a statement of their assets and liabilities, a copy of the indenture under which they operate, the beneficiary, how much has been paid, and so forth. Therefore, the Department of Commerce or of the Treasury, as the case might be, could then look over the facts and figures, separate the sheep from the goats, the chaff from the wheat, and determine which are honest-to-God charitable trusts and which are not. Does the Senator feel it is advisable to have a registry of these trusts?

Mr. GEORGE. I repeat what I have said, the Senator is in a very technical and entirely complex field.

Mr. TOBEY. If I may ask this question, Does the Senator from Georgia mean by that, that the Senator from New Hampshire, by this proposed legislation, is treading upon the toes of some very sacred cows in America?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, no; I do not at all mean that. I am saying the Senator's proposal, as he has offered it—I am now speaking very frankly—would undo so many charitable and religious trusts that I think, before the Senator was through with it, he would be asking the Finance Committee to reenact a part of the law which he might have repealed. It is therefore a subject matter which is not like an excise tax on jewelry or furs or freight bills. It is one that needs some study.

I do not speak now with official permission or information, but I may say that I think I have some ground upon which to base the statement that in the special tax message which the President himself proposes to send to the Congress, perhaps this week or perhaps next week, certain things are going to be referred to as loopholes, and both the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate will be asked to close those loopholes. I am quite sure that what the Senator really has in mind, which is covered by the bill which he introduced, will be one of the indicated loopholes. I have said my information is not official, but if it is at all trustworthy, it is one of the loopholes that both committees and both Houses of Congress will be asked to close. So I think the Senator is going to have full opportunity. So far as excise taxes are concerned, as I have said, the bill is very high on the calendar, and, by motion, it could be taken up tomorrow or any other day when there is not some special order. If it is not taken up at a reasonably early date, I myself pledge the Senator that I shall make the motion, and if I get a majority vote, the Senate will consider it.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I merely conclude with this statement, if I may: I appreciate the words of the Senator from Georgia, the distinguished leader of the great Committee on Finance, and I welcome his cooperation and help and aid and criticisms, constructive and otherwise, as I approach this matter. He has a great degree of intelligence and understanding of this complex subject. He can be a tremendous ally.

There are in the hinterlands of America 140,000,000 persons suffering great injustice. Clever lawyers are relieved of the yoke of taxation which other citizens have to bear. Every dollar which clever lawyers arrange to escape paying the rest of us have to pay, and every industry which avoids its fair share of taxation by establishing and operating charitable trusts has done its fellows throughout the country a great injustice. Common justice cries out to right this wrong.

So, Mr. President, I again refer to the United States Supreme Court Building, which cost $9,000,000. I have looked at the motto which is engraved on it; I love it and cherish it; but let us make it a living force—"Equal justice under law." Make it true in America, so that common men can say that on Capitol Hill we mean what we say.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement in corroboration of what the distinguished Senator from Georgia has said with respect to consideration of excise taxes at some time during this session. In the colloquy which I had a few days ago with the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN], the record will show that I advised him that at some time in the near future during the second session of the present Congress, we will consider the repeal of excise taxes. I agree with the Senator from Georgia that the machinery for the repeal of those taxes should be set in action in the House of Representatives, through the Ways and Means Committee of that body. That committee has been handling such questions for many years. If that committee reports this proposed legislation and the Finance Committee of the Senate has an opportunity to consider it, we shall then have a tax bill coming to us in an orderly way in line with the Democratic processes as we understand them.

Just so surely, Mr. President, as we attach amendments to the oleomargarine bill relating to excise taxes, we are likely to get neither the repeal of the tax on oleomargarine or the repeal of any other excise taxes.

I appeal to those Senators who are vitally concerned with repealing excise taxes to vote down this amendment. I appeal to my friends on this side of the aisle, as well as those on the other side of the aisle, to remember that in the near future we shall consider in the Senate of the United States the repeal of the war-time excise taxes.

Another reason this amendment should not be adopted at this hour is that the Congress of the United States should wait for the message of the President of the United States upon the question of taxation. That message will be placed before the Congress in the immediate future. After it has been received we shall have an opportunity to determine from it what the Congress should do.

I appeal to my friends on both sides of the aisle to reject this amendment.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. As to the suggestion that we pass the bill which has been referred to, which has been pending for 6 months, does not the Senator feel that it is such an unimportant bill that the House would simply ignore it, whereas, if we attach an amendment to the margarine bill the House cannot ignore it? The House must either act on the tax-repeal amendment attached to the margarine bill, or must originate a separate bill in order that we may be able to remove the excise-tax from oleomargarine.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, my reply is simply this: I do not know what the President will recommend with respect to the repeal of excise taxes. Assuming he may recommend the repeal of all the wartime excise taxes, that may also be the position taken by the House of Representatives. But, so far as I am concerned, I do not want to see the job half done. If we are going to undertake the repeal of excise taxes, we should do it in a thorough and orderly manner rather than to take a bite here and a bite there and keep the housewife and the individual purchaser from buying, because the purchaser will say to himself, "Well, I shall wait, because they have taken a little off this excise tax, and I am sure they are going to take some more off, and finally they will repeal it all."

I do not think we shall stimulate the buying power of the country by repealing excise taxes in a piecemeal fashion. In other words, if we want to give to the country an orderly piece of legislation, so far as the repeal of excise taxes is concerned, we had better follow normal processes rather than to do what some Members are trying to do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. AIKEN voted in the affirmative when his name was called.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum was recently declared to be present. Moreover, the roll call has begun, and one Senator has voted.

The roll call will be proceeded with.

The legislative clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senators from Virginia [Mr. BYRD and Mr. ROBERTSON] are attending the inauguration of Hon. John S. Battle as Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia and are therefore necessarily absent.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] are absent on official business as members of a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Works, holding hearings on various flood-control and public works projects in the State of New Mexico.

So Mr. BUTLER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, after line 10, it is proposed to add a new subsection, as follows:

(f) Section 402 of the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act (21 U. S. C., sec. 342) is amended by adding a new subsection (e) as follows:

"(e) If it is oleomargarine or margarine and any of the seeds, beans, nuts, copra, fats, oils, or other raw material used therein consisted in whole or in part of any filthy, putrid, or decomposed substitutes, or was otherwise unfit for food."

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, just a brief word of explanation. The amendment merely applies the pure food and drug sanitation and health code to the materials used in processing oleomargarine. It merely equalizes the sanitation and health standards between oleomargarine and butter.

The only implication of the amendment is that where at present oleo health standards are checked in the refined oil, the amendment would necessitate the checking of the sanitation standards of the raw materials, and check oleo back at the pressing mill or at the plant level, as is done in the case of butter.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask if this is precisely and exactly the same sanitary test that is applied now to butter, or does it go further, or not so far?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I believe it is identical with the test applied in the case of butter. Its jurisdiction is limited. In the case of butter it goes back to the creamery, and the amendment providcs that in the case of oleo the test shall go back to the processing plant, or the plant where the seed or other raw material is processed.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know, from the Senator's answer, whether it is precisely the same. He says he thinks it is precisely the same. I should like to have a yes or no answer, so I could judge the amendment in its relationship to what is required in the case of butter.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I said to the best of my knowledge. I do not claim to be an expert in pure food and drug administration, but the amendment applies the same standard to oleo and the raw materials entering into oleo in processing as is applied to butter as it comes on the creamery level.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Is it not a fact that both butter and oleomargarine are today subject to the Pure Food and Drug Act in the same way? The implication of the amendment is that there is something peculiarly wrong about oleomargarine. The language that is used is designed to try to induce one to think it is normally a filthy, putrid, or decomposed substance, exactly along the line of the argument of a few days ago. I have accepted two amendments which were really designed to prevent any kind of deception.

This amendment was not submitted to the committee. I saw it only a moment ago myself. I am confident it adds nothing to the legitimate protection of the consumer. Actually, the pure food and drug law does not pursue butter back to the source from which it comes, the cow, except in those areas where there is regulation of fluid milk.

I see no reason for singling out oleomargarine at this late day to imply that there is some peculiarity about the raw material. There is no such peculiarity. I do not like to accept the amendment. We are not trying to palm off any decomposed or putrid materials. Those administering the Pure Food Act, during the past 20 years of supervision, have found 100 times as many contaminated materials in butter as in oleomargarine, and I cannot see that this is a legitimate amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Let me reply to the Senator from Arkansas by saying that there is no intention of trying to say that oleo is either putrid, decomposed, or filthy, nor is there any attempt to say that of butter. This is merely an attempt, since we ask for the application of health standards to the dairy farmer, to have more rigid inspection as to oleo.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It does not apply to butter at all, and at the present time we have the same coverage in the pure food law.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am happy to yield to my colleague.

Mr. THYE. The junior Senator from Minnesota is justified in offering this amendment, and I ask the sponsors of the oleomargarine legislation to accept the amendment, for the reason that when the oil comes from the processing plants, the gins where the cottonseed is ginned from the cotton itself, and where the oil is squeezed from the cottonseed are not under the same rigid inspection and sanitary and health requirements which a creamery making butter is required to meet.

This is an effort to give protection to the consumer of oleomargarine, knowing very well that there will be a great increase in the consumption of oleomargarine when the tax is removed. We must safeguard the public, and know that the processing plants which are engaged in processing the raw materials which eventually go into the product come under the same sanitary standards which apply to creameries.

Mr. President, for this reason the amendment of the junior Senator from Minnesota is entirely justified, and the sponsors of the bill should accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair warns the junior Senator from Minnesota that he may yield for a question only, and not for speeches.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I appreciate the application of the rule by the Chair, but I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it has not been done heretofore during the debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The fact that a rule is not applied when the Senate is running along in a normal situation is no reason why it should not apply late in the day when every Senator is trying to get a vote.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I assure the Chair that there is no desire for delay on my part, whether Senators are for health or sanitation or not.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. I was not completely satisfied with the Senator's answer to the Senator from Maryland because I am quite sure there is nothing in the pure-food law to justify the statement that the same standard would apply to butter. But if so, would the Senator be willing to add the word "butter"? If the Senator would add the word "butter" to his amendment, so as to have the same implication apply to butter, I think it would improve it. There would be no discrimination if the word "butter" were added.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am against discrimination in employment, as well as in spread.

Mr. ANDERSON. Would the Senator be willing to add the word "butter" to his amendment? I should like to see him do so, because I would not like to have the farmers think that butter is made from putrid or decomposed substances.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am willing to accept the amendment if the Senator will add the word "butter." Then we might add "cheese," if the Senator would like to do that.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I have before me the Federal Security Agency's notices of judgments under the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act in pursuance of section 705 of the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act. The pamphlet is filled with certain cases pertaining to the dairy industry. There does not seem to be any notation in reference to the matter of the oleo industry, simply because oleo has its sanitary standards at the stage of the refined oil, when the refined oil has been fully processed, but the dairy farmer is required to meet the standards at the stage where the product comes from the farmer, at the creamery level. All we are asking for is that the processors of oleo have exactly the same requirements, placed upon them, because there is in the Pure Food and Drug Act ample law, I will say to all those who have sought the answer with reference to the butter industry, and all those familiar with the act know that to be true.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. If the Senator will agree to insert, after the words "oleomargarine or margarine," the words "or butter," we will take it to conference, and if what the Senator has stated to be the fact with regard to the law is so, I shall have no objection. I do not think the statement is quite accurate, however. If it is accurate, I have no objection if both oleomargarine and butter are included. I understand that to be the position of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Minnesota has submitted an amendment pertaining to the health standards and inspection relating to oleo and raw materials going into oleo. I will leave it to the Members of the Senate to decide whether they want to vote for such standards for the protection of the consumers and for the health of the American people. The record is replete with cases of the use of the courts and the laws of the country with respect to the dairy industry, as was testified to by the Senator from Arkansas and others. The Senator said on the Senate floor that the cases of adulteration of dairy products are some 100 times more than the cases of adulteration of oleo. The reason for the cases respecting dairy products is the rigid supervision that exists, even down to the local level, even down as far as the local dairy barns, insofar as local and State laws are concerned.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The Senator is, I think, entirely in error in that statement. The application of the pure-food laws does not go back to the farm.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator from Minnesota did not say that the application of the pure-food laws went back to the farm.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The reason that there have not been so many cases in connection with margarine is simply that it is easier to protect margarine from contamination. There is no secret about that. That comes about by reason of the way margarine is made. It is mechanically made in a factory, and it is much easier to protect it from the ordinary kind of bacteria that gets into milk. I do not want to become involved in another argument about the relative merits of the two. The fact is that margarine is pure and easier to keep clean.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I do not want to get into an argument respecting the relative merits of the two.

I understand the Senator from Minnesota refuses to apply the language to butter.

Mr. HUMPHREY. No; I did not refuse.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Then I shall accept the amendment, if the Senator will add the word "butter."

Mr. HUMPHREY. If my friend, the Senator from Arkansas, wishes to offer another amendment with respect to butter we will consider it on its merits, and since he is so vitally concerned about the health standards and purity standards of butter, and I am concerned about the health and purity standards of oleo, I shall offer my amendment on oleo, and be more than happy to vote, and vote intelligently, on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas affecting butter.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to my colleague from Minnesota.

Mr. THYE. I wish to ask the junior Senator from Arkansas a question. Is it not true that the oils, whether they be the cottonseed oil or the soybean oil or any other bean oil, or the coconut oil that is shipped from the South Sea islands are not subject to inspection under the Pure Food and Drug Act? Does the Senator think those oils are processed in a more sanitary manner or in a cleaner manner than the average dairy product which is handled in the creameries throughout the land? I should like to have the Senator ponder that question.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. We have talked about that for 2 weeks, and we can go on for two or more weeks discussing it.

Mr. THYE. I have seen a ginning plant. I have seen the open vats and the open spouts which convey the oil. I have seen all around such an operation flies which have followed the oil down through the open spouts to the oil vats. The oleomargarine is made from that. It may be pasteurized, it may be cooked, it may be purified by straining, but nevertheless that is a contamination the oil is subjected to when it is being processed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I suggest the Senate vote on my amendment.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, in paragraph (e), after the words "or margarine" to insert the words "or butter."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. [Putting the question.]

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] as amended. [Putting the question.]

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I note that we may have a vote on the bill before very long. I should like to make a short statement before the vote is taken. I am very sorry that a considerable part of the press and the radio has seen fit to play up this controversy as a struggle over the tax on oleomargarine.

I am for the removal of that tax, as well as for the removal of any direct tax on food commodities, and I am sure that practically the entire dairy industry has no objection to the removal of the tax. We did, however, feel that every effort should be made so to shape this bill that there would be no possibility of imposition on the consumer, or unfair competition with the dairy interests through misrepresentation or misbranding of the product itself.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] was intended for that purpose. However, that amendment did not prevail.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], which was accepted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], and which I certainly hope will be kept in the bill in the conference committee, will, if effectively enforced, prevent the sale or representation of oleomargarine as a dairy product, and provide effective penalties for the enforcement thereof. I personally think that that amendment, offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, as amended by the penalty provision which I proposed, probably gives the dairy industry as much or more protection than the Wiley-Gillette amendment would have given. I feel we have done all that law can do to prevent misrepresentation in this respect. So far as that goes, I see no reason why one cannot now vote for the bill with that amendment attached to it, as well as one could have voted for it had the Wiley-Gillette amendment been accepted. Because, after all, most of us, even those of us from the dairy States, are willing to remove the tax on oleomargarine.

I should like to say, however, that the enactment of this legislation will hurt the dairy interests somewhat. It will make competition much easier. People who do not know the difference are bound to buy oleomargarine and use it, thinking they are using butter. We may expect a decline in the price of dairy products probably within 2 or 3 months after the bill becomes law. We may expect an increase in the cost of oleomargarine to the poor people of our cities, because when yellow oleomargarine becomes the product which is generally carried in the stores, the price will be raised as near as the manufacturers and the dealers can raise it to the butter price. So far as the consumer is concerned, as was pointed out by the able junior Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN] the other day, the consumer in all probability is going to pay more for oleomargarine.

Yes, the dairy industry is going to be hurt somewhat. Our entire economy will be hurt somewhat. But so long as each product is sold under its true name, if not under its true colors, then we can hardly complain. If people prefer oleomargarine then they will buy it. If they prefer butter they will buy that, if they know they are getting butter.

I have referred to the argument made by the junior Senator from New York the other day that it will cost the consumers more in the future to buy oleomargarine. It has already been brought out on the floor that although the tax on colored oleo was only 10 cents a pound, when oleo was colored the average selling price was 21 cents a pound above that of the uncolored oleo.

There is a tremendous profit in the manufacture and sale of this product. This tremendous profit will enable the manufacturers of this commodity to engage in political campaigns and conduct propaganda campaigns through magazines and newspapers. While I do not think the oleo interests are concerned solely in the support of Democratic candidates, yet it is not without significance that one of the leading manufacturers in the oleo industry has recently been selected to head the Democratic campaign-fund dinners.

I should like to say a word about the riders which have been proposed to the bill. Ordinarily I am very much opposed to riders to a bill, and I will not vote for a rider to a bill if I think there is going to be an opportunity to accomplish a worthy purpose by a direct attack through a bill which is brought to the floor of the Senate for that purpose.

So far as the repeal of the excise tax goes, I think the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] is entirely sincere when he says he intends to get a vote on that before the end of the session. However, getting a vote on that in the Senate is one thing, and getting the repeal of the excise taxes enacted into law is something else. I seriously doubt if that will be done. The American people have lived on promises of excise-tax repeal for about 3 years now. There was an opportunity to repeal these taxes this afternoon. It was most unfortunate that the majority side of the Senate saw fit to vote almost unanimously against repeal which they profess to favor.

As to the civil-rights riders; it is now safe to say that there will be no civil-rights legislation at this session. No doubt the FEPC bill or the anti-lynching bill will be brought up, but there is no possible chance of either being enacted into law. The only chance for civil-rights legislation to be enacted at this session of Congress was lost when civil-rights amendments were defeated today.

We have to be practical about these things. Civil-rights legislation cannot be enacted by this Congress, when brought up on the floor of the Senate, where filibusters can be engaged in and where there are not 64 votes to stop such filibusters. The only chance for the enactment of civil-rights legislation at this session of the Senate is as a rider on a bill which the opponents of civil rights feel must be passed. Mr. President, the only way that civil-rights legislation will ever be enacted in this Congress, at least for many years, is simply by attaching it as a rider to legislation which the opponents of civil rights feel they must have. Therefore, any vote to attach the civil-rights bill to the oleo bill was completely justified if one believes in civil-rights legislation at all. It is most significant that the administration forces are strong for civil rights when there is no possible chance of enacting the legislation into law, but vote solidly against it when a real opportunity to enact such legislation presents itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, rather than to take the time of the Senate at this hour, I wish to state that I have prepared a statement relative to the bill and some of the legal complications involved in the proposed legislation upon which we are about to vote. I simply ask consent that my statement be incorporated at this point in the RECORD, in order that the legislative history of the measure we are now considering may be more clear, so that at least the point of view of those who have supported the Wiley-Gillette amendment in the nature of a substitute will be available, to afford opportunity to the Food and Drug Administration to reconsider the regulations it has made in regard to the coloring of oleomargarine.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is perfectly amazing to me that serious consideration should be given by Senators to the fierce opposition of the oleo industry to the yellow color ban.

The truth of the matter is that in 1896, the Congress of the United States in the exercise of the only power it believed it possessed to stamp out fraudulent yellow oleo, imposed what was intended to be a prohibitory tax. Congress at that time believed yellow oleo to be fraudulent. It was and still is.

The Food and Drug Administration with respect to other foods has had an opportunity to consider whether or not the addition of an artificial color to a food is or is not deceptive.

The Food and Drug Administration has never had an opportunity to consider this question in relation to oleomargarine.

An official of the Food and Drug Administration appearing before the Finance Committee on an oleo bill in the Eightieth Congress, when asked whether Food and Drug had opposed the addition of artificial color to oleo when that agency was considering a standard of identity for oleo, stated that because Congress has preempted the field, Food and Drug had no authority to consider the question.

But, Senators, how had Congress preempted the field? It had preempted the field by defining yellow oleo in order to impose what was intended to be a suppressive tax. That is the kind of recognition which Congress gave to yellow oleo. The irony of the oleo situation is that because of that backhanded recognition, Food and Drug was powerless to consider the question of whether or not artificial color in oleo is deceptive.

What would the Food and Drug Administration have done if it had had an opportunity? I don't know, but I'm sure their determination would have been based on a most exhaustive examination of the question, as their decisions always are.

But there are many striking parallels in the food field, all pointing to a sound doctrine of food law to which every Senator must subscribe. That doctrine is:

"The purchaser of foods is guided many times in the identity of a product, by its flavor, its appearance, and its physical properties, regardless of what statements are made on the label, with respect to artificial color or flavor as the case may be; and it is one of the fundamentals of law enforcement procedure that such effects, resulting from appearances and flavors, when they are deceptive are not correctible by label declaration."

Let me review briefly for you some of the cases in which this sound principle has been applied. Some of them are court decisions, others administrative actions of Food and Drug.

The first case to which I will refer is U. S. v. Two Bags of Poppy Seeds (147 Fed. (2d) 123):

"This case involves the familiar poppy seeds which are widely used to decorate and flavor bread rolls and other bakery goods. The Circuit Court of Appeals for the sixth circuit had before it some British Indian poppy seeds which are naturally white but which had been artificially colored to resemble the more valuable Dutch blue and Turkish grey seeds. The Government sought to have the food condemned because the artificially colored seeds, which were indistinguishable to the ordinary consumer from the more valuable seeds, were made to appear of greater value than they actually were. In this case the only difference between the imitation poppy seeds and the genuine was the market value. In flavor and food value they were the same. As in the case of yellow oleomargarine, the owner of the seeds claimed that the purpose of coloring the white poppy seeds was to impart 'eye appeal.' However the Court saw behind this explanation and found that artificial coloring concealed the price inferiority and made the seeds appear better or of greater value. The artificial coloring had enhanced the value of the seeds from 10 cents, the price of uncolored, to 20 cents per pound for the colored. The bags had been labeled to indicate the presence of the artificial coloring but this was no defense. A decree of condemnation was ordered to be entered."

Next, let us turn to mayonnaise. Not only is artificial color prohibited, but spices which impart a yellow color are prohibited. Listen to the finding of fact made by the Federal Security Administrator in support of his prohibition:

"In these dressings the use of turmeric or saffron is apt to deceive consumers, because the yellow color imparted by these spices causes the dressing to appear to contain more egg yolk than it actually contains. For this reason no turmeric, saffron, or any spice oil or spice extract or other seasoning or flavoring ingredient which imparts to the dressing a color simulating the color imparted by egg yolk should be included in the optional ingredients for mayonnaise or salad dressing."

In a very recent case tried before a jury in a Federal court in Camden, N. J. (U. S. v. 88 Cases of Bireley's Orange Beverage), Food and Drug proceeded against an orange drink which contained a small amount of orange oil and orange-juice concentrate, but which was artificially colored so as to resemble orange juice. The jury found for the Government, which had contended that the production was adulterated.

Let's look now at the definitions and standards for macaroni and noodle products. There the use of artificial color is not permitted. To support this prohibition the Administrator published this finding of fact (Finding H 27, Dec. 17, 1942; F. R. 10728):

"The use in macaroni products or egg-noodle products of artificial coloring or other colored ingredients which impart a color simulating that of an egg product is a deceptive and unfair practice that has been followed to some extent."

So sensitive to the possibility of deception was the Administrator on this subject that in fixing a standard for "vegetable macaroni products," yellow tomatoes may not be used because they would impart a color resembling eggs (Finding No. 34).

In this same group of products we find that carotene may not be added to alimentary paste for the reason that it is calculated to deceive consumers because it imparts to the finished product a color resembling that of egg.

Turning to bakery products, the Food and Drug Administration has ruled—"In our opinion, bakery products or any other food containing pumpkin which gives the appearance of having an egg content when no eggs are present, or a greater egg content than is the case, would be an adulterated article under any form of labeling."

There are many other instances which may be cited, but the policy is clear and the reason for it equally so—that the concealment by the use of artificial color of any type of damage or inferiority whether it be loss of strength, quality or commercial value constitutes adulteration.

For years internal-revenue regulation had been effective because it suppressed the sale of yellow oleo. At the time of the food and drug hearings to establish a standard for oleomargarine no yellow product was being manufactured for sale in regular commercial channels.

In recent months it has been observed that yellow oleo is being manufactured in large volume, with the very result that caused enforcement officials to prohibit the additional artificial color to the poppy seeds. The relatively valueless artificial color has enhanced the price from 6 to 30 cents a pound above the price of uncolored plus tax.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the text of a statement I have released to the press explaining my reasons for supporting the oleomargarine bill, but opposing the excise tax and civil-rights riders sought to be attached thereto.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILLIAM BENTON, OF CONNECTICUT

I intend to vote for repeal of Federal restrictions on the sale of oleomargarine. I intend to oppose all amendments which would restrict the legitimate sale of oleo through the exercise of the Federal power over interstate commerce.

I have taken this position because I am opposed to trade barriers which raise living costs or curtail production and employment in this country. I am also opposed to prohibiting the shipment of yellow oleo in interstate commerce because this opens the door to local monopolies which can jack up prices if they are not subject to competitive pressures.

In all frankness to the people of Connecticut, I should point out that repeal of present Federal taxes on oleomargarine will not guarantee Connecticut consumers cheap, colored oleo. Under the terms of this bill, restrictions imposed by State legislatures still apply. Connecticut law will continue to prohibit the sale of colored oleo in our State even if this present bill passes the Congress.

Reading my mail, I have obtained the impression that many Connecticut families are not aware of this important fact. Many of them, apparently, have been led to believe that this bill removes all oleo restrictions, both Federal and State. This is not the case. This should be completely understood. After the Federal Government acts, Connecticut must still act in line with the recommendations made by Governor Bowles.

I also intend to vote against any riders which may be brought up as a parliamentary device to kill the repeal of Federal oleo restrictions.

I favor the elimination of many wartime excise taxes which are hurting our economy and Connecticut industry in particular. I favor prompt passage of President Truman's civil-rights program and I will vote to limit debate wherever needed to accomplish that result. The freedom and unity of all people is the ultimate foundation of America's strength at home and her influence abroad. My experience in the Department of State particularly focused my interest and activities on this great area of human rights, of which the civil-rights program is an integral part. Enactment of this program will bring our practices of democracy into line with the Bill of Rights in our Constitution and with the declaration of human rights adopted by the United Nations.

Because of my strong and lifelong views on the merits of civil-rights legislation, I want to see that legislation considered promptly on its merits and pressed to enactment. I must, however, vote against any attempt to misuse that issue by attaching civil-rights riders to the margarine bill. Such riders are not designed to expedite enactment of civil-rights legislation but rather represent a misuse of that proposed legislation for the purpose of killing the margarine bill. Such riders will delay and impede the real consideration of civil-rights legislation on its merits.

These riders should be opposed for another reason. I have always advocated and worked for efficiency in Government and efficiency in Congress. The use of riders not germane to pending legislation stultifies the legislative procedure and runs counter to every concept of efficient governmental activity. If we do not strike down such riders, the Senate would always be at the mercy of every and any parliamentary maneuver calculated to prevent forthright decisions on important questions of national policy.

I hope and believe that the fair-minded and devoted advocates of civil-rights legislation in Connecticut and throughout the Nation will understand the real issues here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WITHERS (when his name was called). On this vote, I have a pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN], who is necessarily absent on official business. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senators from Virginia [Mr. BYRD and Mr. ROBERTSON] are attending the inauguration of Hon. John S. Battle as Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia and are therefore necessarily absent.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], and the Senator from Missisippi [Mr. STENNIS] are absent on official business as members of a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Works, holding hearings on various flood-control and public-works projects in the State of New Mexico.

So the bill H. R. 2023 was passed.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, request a conference thereon with the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. GEORGE, Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. BYRD, Mr. MILLIKIN, and Mr. TAFT conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I now ask unanimous consent that the bill may be printed with the amendments adopted by the Senate numbered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF THE HATCH ACT

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 1243, Calendar No. 428, a bill to amend the Hatch Act.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1243) to amend the Hatch Act, which had been reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration with amendments.

REDUCTION AND REPEAL OF EXCISE TAXES

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3905, Calendar No. 644, to amend section 3121 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate cannot adopt that motion without displacing the bill which already has been made the unfinished business.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I simply wish to suggest to the Senate that it should lay aside what has become the unfinished business in favor of House bill 3905, which was reported favorably by the House of Representatives last June, and was reported to the Senate calendar on July 11 by the Finance Committee. The bill is on the subject of repealing and reducing excise taxes.

I have moved that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. CAIN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Washington will not press the motion. We have had two or three votes upon the question of excise taxes. The distinguished Senator from Georgia has assured the Senate he will call up this bill at the proper time. I have attempted to reassure the Senate, as majority leader, that we shall consider excise taxes, and, after all, what the Senator is now attempting to do is to take over the leadership of the Senate. Mr. President, if the Senate were to permit the Senator from Washington to displace the bill which is now the unfinished business, we would do violence to the orderly procedure of business. It would simply mean that the Republican Senators are taking over the leadership of the Senate. I do not think the Senator wants to do that.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Washington has no possible desire to quarrel or to argue with his distinguished friend, the majority leader, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], but the reasons why the Senate in recent hours has turned down a consideration of the excise-tax question do not apply to the consideration the Senate itself has said it would give to the question if and when House bill 3905 was called up for consideration and action.

I argue, as I think every thoughtful Senator on the floor does, that because the House of Representatives has already taken affirmative action on H. R. 3905, and because a great standing committee of the Senate has recommended favorable action on an excise-tax reduction amendment, and because every Senator almost without exception has said, "Give us an adequate and legitimate opportunity to vote on the question and we will get rid of the excise taxes"——

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAIN. The junior Senator from Washington, and I trust others will support him, is merely attempting to provide an opportunity for the Senate to do what it has so often said it wants to do, and in my considered opinion we could take up H. R. 3905 and pass it before the afternoon is over.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, he said the House of Representatives had passed this bill, and that it had been referred to the Finance Committee.

Mr. CAIN. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. I believe that is not quite a correct statement of fact. I do not believe the House of Representatives has ever passed upon any excise taxes. What happened was, the Finance Committee, on the motion of the Senator from Colorado, attached an excise-tax amendment to a revenue bill which came to the Finance Committee from the House of Representatives. We reported the bill as amended. It has been on the calendar since the date the Senator suggested.

Mr. CAIN. I am very pleased the distinguished Senator from Illinois has mentioned what is obviously a fact. I said the bill, by number, had been reported favorably to the Senate by the committee.

Mr. LUCAS. Yes; but I think the Senator left the impression the House of Representatives had acted on excise taxes. It has not.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Illinois has established what the American people want to know, namely, that the Senate of the United States was so anxious 6 months ago, through its standing Committee on Finance, to repeal and reduce excise taxes that they added an amendment to a bill which the House sent to the Senate. In view of all the discussion about excise taxes this afternoon and in view of the repeated assertions by both Democrats and Republicans, assertions known to the average citizen of this country, that the excise taxes will be repealed or reduced at the earliest possible moment, why should we not take the advice, counsel, and leadership which has come from the Finance Committee, call the roll, and reduce the excise taxes this afternoon.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I do not have the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington has the floor.

Mr. CAIN. The Senator from Washington is pleased to yield for a question.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask for the floor in my own right, for a brief statement. It seems to me the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator cannot make a statement in the time of the Senator from Washington, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I should like to conclude a brief statement, and then I shall yield the floor, which will certainly permit the Senator from Florida and other Senators to make any observations they may care to offer.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for a question, I should like to address a question to him at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida for a question?

Mr. CAIN. I am very happy to yield for a question.

Mr. HOLLAND. Does not the Senator recall that this afternoon in his argument the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], chairman of the Finance Committee, made quite clear that he felt the Senate should await the message of the President of the United States upon the subject of taxation before taking action on the subject of excise taxes, and that that was one of the reasons upon which the Senate predicated its action?

Mr. CAIN. I am keenly conscious of what the distinguished Senator from Georgia said. I should like to say, because I mean it, that I have a very great respect for his thoughtfulness, for his intellect, and for his considered judgments given to the Senate.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CAIN. I will yield in a few moments if the Senator will permit me to conclude the answer as I think proper. I find it proper in this instance to differ with the Senator from Georgia, because I feel the body which represents the people of the United States, the Congress, ought to make up its mind concerning what it wants to do for a change, and do it. Six short months ago Democrats and Republicans on the Finance Committee said, "We want to repeal and reduce excise taxes." The American people want that done. We all know that the President is said to have stated that he would have had a tax measure and message before the Congress some days ago. It is not here. No one knows when it is coming. But, for one, merely as an individual Senator representing in part one sovereign State, and feeling as I do about the need of benefiting America, for a change, by getting rid of some of the war-created excise taxes, I think we as a part of the Congress ought to decide what action should be taken, rather than wait and wait and wait for a Presidential measure, the nature of which we do not know anything about, and concerning the authorship of which most of us are going to be seriously in doubt. I want to call to the attention of the Senator from Florida and of other Senators who care to listen what the distinguished Senator from Georgia, in his role as chairman of the Finance Committee, said, and what other members of that committee agreed to in the concluding paragraph of the report which urged the passage of H. R. 3905:

> The war excise-tax rates were imposed along with the excess-profits tax and heavy corporation income taxes and individual income taxes. The excess-profits tax has been repealed, and individual and corporate income taxes reduced. It is believed only fair that some reduction should be made in the war excise-tax rates, which are interfering with consumer purchasing power and are increasing the cost of doing business.

I emphasize the words, "It is believed only fair." Who wrote those words? Thirteen Senators of the United States Senate, both Democrats and Republicans. It is believed only fair that some reductions should be made in the war excise-tax rates, which are interfering—with what?

Interfering with consumer purchasing power and are increasing the cost of doing business.

Six months ago a standing committee said, "These bad things are facts today; let us get rid of them." The Senator from Washington hopes that a good many Senators, both Democrats and Republicans, will support the motion just offered by him to settle down and get rid of these taxes, now that we have been given advice by the committee to whom we look for counsel and direction, and because every Senator in the Chamber, and our gallery guests too, are as keenly conscious as are we of the desire of the American people to reduce and eliminate these taxes which have completely outworn their moral justification. The only reason we continue to have war excise taxes is that they produce dollars which we find it necessary to spend, with the greatest extravagance the world has ever known. I press my motion.

Mr. LUCAS and Mr. LODGE rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, in a few moments I shall move an executive session to consider the nomination of the Secretary of the Interior, the Honorable Oscar L. Chapman of Colorado. Before I do that, I want to say merely a word or two in reply to the distinguished Senator from Washington, who has become vocal so suddenly and so greatly interested in the repeal of the wartime excise taxes.

I do not recall that the Senator from Washington made any such motion last year, after the bill was reported from the Finance Committee by a vote of 7 to 6. It was on the calendar a long time. We had a debate upon different questions, running several days. Many bills were considered. The Senator from Washington was there, and I am sure, had he been as much interested in the repeal of the excise taxes then as he is now, he would have been trying to take the leadership away from the Democratic Party during the last session.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. One moment.

Mr. CAIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington is trying to take the leadership away from the Democratic Party and set up the kind of program he thinks ought to be considered by the Senate. Mr. President, that is not done very often. It has not been done since I have been a Member of the Senate. No one that I ever recall, when the Republicans were in power 2 years ago, attempted to take over and tell the Republican majority what they should do with respect to a program.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. I only asked that the Senator yield, in view of what he has just said. I should like to say that my degree of interest was no more keen in the latter stages of the last session of the Eighty-first Congress, than it is this afternoon. But I, along with a number of other Senators, have placed reliance on the assurances many times given that action would be taken on this question. I think it fair to state——

Mr. LUCAS. I shall not yield to the Senator for a speech.

Mr. CAIN. I am not trying to take over the leadership——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois declines to yield further.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, we have had the question of excise taxes up on at least two different occasions during consideration of the margarine bill. It was rejected both times for the reason which was stated over and over again by the distinguished Senator from Georgia, the chairman of the Finance Committee. He has left the Senate for the day and is not present to argue that point. He will be here tomorrow, and, of course, wants to make an argument against this motion.

I want to say, Mr. President, that so long as I am majority leader of the Senate, the Policy Committee representing the Democratic Party in the Senate will meet and lay down certain policies which we believe are for the best interests of the country. I do not believe that any Senator on the other side of the aisle is going to make a motion such as has been made by the distinguished Senator from Washington and meet with success. I am satisfied that when all the Democratic Members realize what is attempted to be done, they will stand unanimously back of the Senator from Illinois in what he is attempting to do.

I have told Senators on the other side of the aisle, as well as my Democratic friends, that the repeal of excise taxes will be given consideration in due course. But some Senators cannot wait. There are some politics involved in the repeal of the excise taxes. It is a great political issue, and some Senators want to get on the band wagon before it has started.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question regarding something which is not a political issue.

Mr. LUCAS. I am glad to have my comrade do that.

Mr. LODGE. I realize the responsibility of the majority leader, and I try never to ask him a question without giving him notice. I am not trying to surprise him at all. But I have written him one or two letters and have received no reply to them, so I should like to ask him whether it will be possible, within the next week or so, to proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 2, providing for a constitutional amendment to abolish the electoral college and to count the electoral vote in proportion to the popular vote. I understand that the majority's policy committee has decided to call up the equal-rights amendment, which is a constitutional amendment. The resolution to which I have referred is another constitutional amendment which is also on the calendar. It has been very carefully considered. The Senate is ready to vote on it, and I should like to express the hope that we can get it up at the same time the Senate takes up the equal-rights amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. In reply to my friend from Massachusetts, I want to apologize to him for not answering his letters with respect to the consideration of the measure which he has in mind and which is now pending upon the Senate Calendar. However, we have already considered in the policy committee the resolution now being discussed with the Senator from Massachusetts. I shall not give the Senator from Massachusetts definite assurance, but I believe that in due course we shall be able to take up that resolution. We have discussed it, but no decision has been reached.

I may say to the Senator that what we try to do in the majority policy committee is to arrange a schedule of bills for the Senate to consider for the next week or 10 days. As the policy committee meets practically every week, it is in a position to consider a number of measures and keep the schedule arranged in orderly fashion in advance of Senate action. I do not hold any particular brief for the Senator's resolution; neither am I opposed to it. I should like to give it more study. I think the policy committee, before we finish the session, will give that resolution the consideration which it deserves.

Mr. LODGE. I hope the measure will be taken up fairly soon, because my experience, which goes back quite a few years, has been that if we do not take up a matter of that kind during the early part of the session, it will be too late.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with the Senator that it takes a long time to consider a measure which should be passed in 3 or 4 days. We have been debating the repeal of the oleomargarine tax for more than 2 weeks, but there is nothing we can do in the Senate, so far as concerns expediting measures of that kind. It was debated thoroughly, and most of the arguments were germane to the issue, but we took a long time, in my opinion, to act upon the oleomargarine bill. If business is not facilitated, it may require a long time to dispose of other measures which must be acted upon.

Mr. President, I do not want to charge any Senator with delay and obstruction, but I believe that last year, in the first half of the session, there was an unusual amount of delay, and obstruction. While I should like to complete the work of this session as quickly as would any other

Senator, a certain amount of work must and will be done, and we might just as well understand that.

I am not attempting to lecture any Member of the Senate, but it will be recalled that last year I thought it necessary to announce to remain here until Thanksgiving in order to complete the program. Certain things have to be done, and we are going to do them, regardless of the time it takes. I want to expedite the business of the Senate as much as does any other Member of the Senate. That is one reason I started consideration of the margarine bill the day the President's message was delivered.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I should like to ask the distinguished majority leader whether it is quite fair to make the statement that 2 weeks' time has been consumed on the oleomargarine bill. As a matter of fact, many other important matters have been discussed. Is not that correct?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is quite correct. I may have been in error in making that statement, but many irrelevant matters, not at all germane to the subject, were discussed during that time.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. I should like to understand clearly the position of the Senator from Illinois. In response to the Senator from Washington, he referred to efforts being made "on the other side of the aisle" to displace the program of the majority party.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. DONNELL. Does the Senator from Illinois consider that Members of the minority are estopped from making motions on the floor or from endeavoring to persuade Members upon the other side of the aisle to join——

Mr. LUCAS. No; they may go as far as they like.

Mr. DONNELL. Does the Senator consider that it is proper democratic process—I use that term in the broad sense—because one political party in the Senate has decided upon a program that no member of the other political party shall have a right at least to test the vote of the Senate as to whether that program is wise?

Mr. LUCAS. No. The Senator can go as far as he wants to go. He can test out any motion to take up any measure he desires. But that has not been done very often in the Senate of the United States. If we go back into the history of the Eightieth Congress, when the Republican Party was in power, we cannot find one Democrat attempting to displace the program which was laid down by the Republican Party during the 2 years it was in power. If a Senator can do that, he takes away the leadership of the party in power. I do not think the Senator is going to do it. It is within his power to make the attempt. I understand some of these moves a little better than perhaps some Members would like. I understand what some people would like to do to the Democratic Party this year, which is an election year, in this second half of the Eighty-first Congress. Some persons would like to black out the program and confuse issues as much as they possibly can. But we are not going to be misguided by anyone attempting to displace a piece of legislation which has been brought up in good faith by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. We shall test it out by a vote when the time comes.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. Does the Senator mean to imply that the Senator from Washington, in making this motion, has been motivated by improper motives of any kind?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator can use his own judgment as to what I mean.

Mr. DONNELL. I have asked the Senator a direct question. The Senator has stated upon the floor of the Senate that he is not so lacking in knowledge as some of us might think he is. I am sure that the Senate agrees. I have the highest respect for both his ability and his good qualities, but I want to have it perfectly clear on the floor of the Senate this afternoon that because I am a member of the opposite party from the majority party, neither the Senator from Washington, the Senator from Missouri, nor any other Senator is estopped from bringing up a motion in good faith to set aside the program which has been presented.

Will the Senator permit a further statement?

Mr. LUCAS. Go right ahead.

Mr. DONNELL. I have failed to see upon the floor of the Senate this afternoon any such urgency in regard to changing the provisions of the Hatch Act as would justify such a tremendous effort to overcome an attempt to bring up a matter of tax legislation.

I appreciate that the Democrats are in control of the Senate, and I have no desire in the world to doubt the fact that they are in the majority, but, Mr. President, I say most respectfully that I would be one who would dissent from the idea that, because the Democratic Party was in control of the Senate, we upon the Republican side were estopped from bringing up motions with respect to the program, in the hope, even though the hope might turn out not to have been well founded, of persuading some of the Senators on the other side of the aisle of the merits of our proposals.

Mr. LUCAS. I am sure it will take more than the Senator from Illinois to estop the Senator from Missouri from attempting to bring up anything which he desires to bring up, and to debate it thoroughly, because the Senator from Missouri is a very methodical and a very meticulous gentleman. We are all well acquainted with his ability and the great amount of time which he consumes on every question which comes before the Senate, and we all learn from listening to his erudite discussions of almost every question which comes before the Senate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Illinois if he thinks that, in the absence of the chairman of the Finance Committee, it would be possible to get a vote this afternoon on the motion of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. LUCAS. No; it will not be possible.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Illinois if it is his plan, since there is no possibility of acting on this motion, to move an executive session so that we may consider the nomination of Oscar L. Chapman to be Secretary of the Interior, a nomination which, I may say, was unanimously reported by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Mr. LUCAS. I intend to do that. I do not know whether the Senator was on the floor when I made the explanation a moment ago, but I hope the Senator from Wyoming is not trying to rush an executive session, in view of the parliamentary maneuvering which is being carried on here. I always hope to get help from the Senator from Wyoming; apparently on this occasion he wants to leave the subject and take up the Executive Calendar.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. I should like to ask the able majority leader, inasmuch as he has accused some Senators on this side of the aisle of playing politics, whether it would be possible that his haste to take up the amendment of the Hatch Act might not likewise be political, in view of elections coming up this year?

Mr. LUCAS. I am not surprised that the Senator would make such a charge. He is usually lying in wait to find something like that. When the Senator from Arizona presents the bill tomorrow, the Senator from Indiana can debate with the Senator from Arizona whether or not it is a political move. I am, of course, satisfied that the Senator from Indiana never engages in political activities. He is one of those who are elected without getting into politics, and never plays politics. He is one of those nonpolitical fellows who does the nonpolitical thing every time; everybody understands that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. LUCAS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CAIN. What is the prevailing status of the motion made by the Senator from Washington?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The prevailing status is that if the Senate takes a recess today the motion of the Senator from Washington will carry over until tomorrow.

Mr. CAIN. I thank the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no reports of committees, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY—NOMINATIONS PASSED OVER

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of John F. Floberg to be Assistant Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. LUCAS. I ask that that nomination, as well as that of Admiral Forrest P. Sherman to be Chief of Naval Operations, be passed over again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations will be passed over.

NOMINATION OF OSCAR L. CHAPMAN TO BE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Oscar L. Chapman to be Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, if there were a record vote on the nomination of Mr. Chapman, I should vote in favor of it. I shall vote for confirmation if there is a viva voce vote.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. President, I wish to take a brief moment to express my pleasure, and the happiness of the people of Idaho, and I believe of the entire West, at the nomination of Oscar L. Chapman to be Secretary of the Interior. He is eminently qualified. He has served in the Department of the Interior since 1933. He understands the problems of the West, and we are very happy to have a westerner as Secretary of the Interior.

The only regret I have, and I am sure the people of Idaho would feel the same way, is that Oscar L. Chapman is not from Idaho, not that we begrudge Colorado, but we would be very glad to have him as a citizen of Idaho.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, like my colleague, the Senator from Idaho, I do not think the nomination of Oscar L. Chapman should be confirmed without my adding a word of congratulations to him on his appointment to his new post. As the Senator from Idaho has said, we of the West are very conscious of Mr. Chapman's great sympathy and great understanding and wise handling not only of our great power, reclamation, and irrigation projects, but of all the great western developments the Government has undertaken to finance and develop in our area.

As I have said, Oscar Chapman has had a great understanding of the problems of the West. His wisdom in aiding, in the Department of the Interior and otherwise, in the beginnings, when the projects of power, reclamation, and irrigation were receiving a great deal of criticism from the disbelievers who thought not only they could not adequately pay back, but that the projects were not in fact self-liquidating, received no help from Oscar Chapman, who believed in the West, and in its great potentialities.

So, Mr. President, we of the western area are happy to see Oscar Chapman now assume the great office of Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I have prepared some remarks in support of the confirmation of Oscar L. Chapman, but in view of the lateness of the hour, I ask unanimous consent to have them printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, Mr. LEHMAN'S statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Yesterday the junior Senator from New York made his maiden speech. It was on the subject of oleomargarine. I had not planned to make that speech. I had hoped to reserve my first words for a happier occasion. This today is such an occasion.

I am indeed pleased to be able to add my voice to those who today urge the confirmation of the nomination of Oscar Chapman as Secretary of the Interior.

I have known of Oscar Chapman even longer than I have known the man personally and my personal friendship goes back many years. His reputation preceded him in New York State, although he is a westerner by preference and adoption. He was known to us not so much as an advocate of conservation and reclamation, of the welfare of the Indians and of the peoples of the Territories—although he was known to us in that respect, too—but rather as a friend of the weak and the oppressed, of the underprivileged and the undefended. He became a champion, a spokesman, and a friend. He was a man who spoke out against both intolerance and tyranny, who offered his energies and his support to that large majority of our people who, in their individual groups, are unhappily called the minorities. In the early thirties he organized the Washington branch of the committee to save the Jewish people when the people of my faith were in the early throes of their agonies under the Nazis. He has labored hard to assist, in all parts of our country, underprivileged children, delinquent boys, and young persons in trouble.

I think the fact that Oscar Chapman has been honored by such various groups as the B'nai B'rith, Howard University, and the Sons of the American Revolution is testimony to the depth of his concern for the welfare of all.

In the city of New York there live some hundreds of thousands of natives of the island of Puerto Rico, American citizens from one of the most underprivileged sectors of the national population. Oscar Chapman is known to them as a tireless worker in their interest and in the interest of all their fellow Puerto Ricans. For 16 years he has had a special concern for their welfare and their advancement and their progress. In all these enthusiasms and efforts Oscar Chapman has not been parochial.

He is known also as a friend of the Negro, the Hungarian, the Czech, the Pole, the Italian, the Irish; in short, he is a friend of those many elements which go to make up the life of America.

This modest man—for that has always been his principal characteristic—sought always to serve and seldom to be served. In the ranks of the Democratic Party, he was always the worker. In his long and distinguished service in the Department of the Interior, he was a source of comfort and assistance to those of us who looked, from time to time, for comfort and assistance from the Interior Department and the Federal Government in Washington.

Oscar Chapman has not sought the spotlight or clothed himself in borrowed glamor. Only yesterday he told the Committee on Interior Affairs, of which I have the honor of being a member, that he did not pretend to know all the answers. I think he knows more of the answers than his share. But we can expect that the new Secretary of the Interior will be the same Oscar Chapman who was Under Secretary and Assistant Secretary for the past 16 years * * * a man of courage, vision, and boldness, but still unassuming and unpretentious.

Oscar Chapman was a seagoing sailor during the First World War. I have heard, and the story comes from Secretary Chapman himself, that he made 33 crossings of the Atlantic, and was seasick on every crossing. That showed him to be a man of constant and persistent habits. Now as Secretary of the Interior, the country looks to him to be persistent in his liberalism and constant in his vision and devotion to those same good causes and high purposes which have marked his public career thus far.

I understand that with the confirmation of Secretary Chapman there will be two distinguished citizens of the great State of Colorado in the President's Cabinet. I understand that this is unprecedented. There was even the rumor that this circumstance might have prevented Secretary Chapman's nomination. This rumor was happily false. But had it had even the faintest basis in fact, I am sure that the Empire State of New York would have been proud to put in a claim for Secretary Chapman and present him as its own.

The country expects that Oscar Chapman will make a great Secretary of the Interior. That is a sound expectation. I shall be happy to cast my vote for the confirmation of a fine American and a great liberal, Oscar Chapman.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, although I am not from the West, but am from the Northeast, I consider it a privilege to add my word of commendation of the appointment of Oscar L. Chapman to be Secretary of the Interior. Throughout his career in the State of Colorado and in the Federal Government he has exemplified the highest type of public servant, dedicated to the welfare of the Nation and the American people.

In the years I have known him, I have been continually impressed with his profound knowledge of the problems which have faced this Nation. In his appearances before committees of the Senate his understanding and clear presentation of these issues, and his close consultation with the Members of this body, have made possible a fine type of cooperation in our efforts to resolve these problems.

As an administrator, Oscar Chapman has gained a high type of recognition. Keenly conscious of the problems of government through long experience, his career as an Assistant Secretary and later as Under Secretary of the Interior, where he had over-all responsibility for administrative management, was marked by a continuing and successful effort to render always more effective service to the American people.

Finally, it is as a man that I wish to commend Oscar Chapman. Throughout his long years in office, he has constantly evidenced his warm interest in the problems of others, not only as a type, or as a class, but also as individual human beings. The many who have the privilege of knowing him are convinced that he is eminently well qualified for the high honor and responsibilities of this new office.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am sure that it will give the Secretary of the Interior great pleasure to note the commendation which has been expressed here this afternoon, particularly the words of approval which come from Senators upon the Atlantic seaboard. Speaking as chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, I undertake for Secretary Chapman to express his appreciation.

The Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs unanimously, on a roll-call vote of every member of the committee, recommended confirmation of the nomination. It is a deserved tribute to a most excellent administrator.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I wish to join these commendations, but coming from an Eastern State I join with the Senator from Idaho in regretting Mr. Chapman does not come from my State.

I wish to add another commendation, which I think would fit many Eastern States. From my dealings with Mr. Chapman I have come to find that he has a proper appreciation of conservation of natural resources. Among the many great resources of my State is coal, and I have found he understands the problems of coal, as well as the problems of conservation generally. For that reason I wish also to add my voice in commendation of the nomination, which I think is an excellent one.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate the country and the President of the United States on the appointment of Mr. Chapman to the great office of Secretary of the Interior. Particularly I desire to congratulate the Indians, 400,000 of them, who at last, in my opinion, have one of their very best friends in a position of power.

I remember very well the investigation Mr. Chapman made only 2 years ago of the Navajo and the Hopi Indians. I know he is thoroughly familiar with the Indians in Alaska, in North and South Dakota, in Minnesota, and in some other States. I think we shall find that at last we will have someone in that office who is going to give active support to the Indians.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I should like to associate myself with what has been said respecting Mr. Chapman. The hour is late and I do not wish to detain the Senate, but I will say that I also believe the appointment to be an excellent one, and I thoroughly approve of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination of Oscar L. Chapman, of Colorado, to be Secretary of the Interior, is confirmed, and, without objection, the President will be notified.

SHORTAGE OF COAL IN THE WEST—NEED FOR ACTION IN THE COAL SITUATION

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, there is bitter disappointment in the Rocky Mountain section of the United States because of the failure and unwillingness of the Chief Executive to invoke the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which would authorize him to declare a national emergency and proceed to take action that would result in maximum production of coal. We read in the press that it is questionable whether there is any national emergency, and while I shall not qualify myself to speak for other sections of the country, without hesitation I can say that because of unusually severe winter weather and blizzards which are raging in the Rocky Mountain areas there is extreme suffering and distress, and conditions which point to a national emergency unless there is a greater production of coal.

The people in the State of Idaho and in the surrounding States are heartened by the fact that the chief counsel of the National Labor Relations Board, Robert Denham, is proposing to ask for a court injunction which will ban the short workweek in the soft-coal mining industry.

Mr. President, I have received hundreds of letters and telegrams from my State during the past 2 weeks appealing for some action by Congress. In reply I merely pointed out that it is not within the province or jurisdiction of the legislative branch to compel the Chief Executive to enforce the provisions of an act with which he may not be in sympathy. I should like to quote one or two telegrams showing that there is an acute situation in my State. I quote one sent me by trustees of a school district in Idaho as follows:

> Coal shortage critical. Local supply exhausted. The closing of schools and severe weather are creating a national emergency. Request you and other Idaho Representatives to use all influence in persuading the President to declare an emergency under the Taft-Hartley law.

I read one other telegram sent me by the Idaho Coal Dealers' Association, representing most of the dealers in that State and in eastern Oregon:

> Representing the coal dealers a survey has been completed today—
> On January 16—
> showing average of 3 days' supply on ration basis. Expected weather will wipe out stock even with expected 3 days' supply from mines this week. Week to 10 days required for deliveries to reach this territory from mines. Urge all possible action to bring about return of miners on full-week basis.

Mr. President, I have accurate statistics received only today from the Coal Producers' Association of the State of Utah, which annually furnishes about one and one-half million tons of coal for the State of Idaho. So as to show that there is not the necessary and essential production, I point out that in December 1948, the soft-coal miners in Utah worked 26 days, and in the corresponding month of December 1949 they worked only 11 days, resulting in a reduction of 52 percent below the production in the same month in the previous year.

Taking the first 14 days of January 1950, there was only 5 days' production of coal, whereas in the same 2 weeks' period the year previously the miners worked 11 days. The result is that there is a 57-percent reduction in the coal production this year compared with the same period in 1949.

Mr. President, without taking any more time of the Senate at this late hour I merely want to emphasize the fact that during the past 17 years this country has been in an almost perpetual state of emergency; and it seems peculiar at this time, when these tragic and desperate conditions are confronting many States in the West, which are experiencing blizzards and extremely cold winter weather, that the Chief Executive, for some reason that he may justify only for himself, refuses to invoke the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. I deem it my responsibility, Mr. President, to register an emphatic protest against this failure on the part of the Chief Executive, because I am sure that in the days ahead, unless some remedial action is taken, there will be unnecessary and widespread suffering on the part of the people of my State and in the surrounding area in the Rocky Mountain section.

THE COAL SITUATION IN KANSAS

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, in view of the remarks that have just been made, and because of the lateness of the hour, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the body of the RECORD a statement which I have prepared and which I desired to make with reference to the coal situation as it affects my State.

There being no objection, Mr. SCHOEPPEL's statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

> Mr. President, within the last 2 weeks I have been receiving numerous inquiries and requests for assistance in obtaining supplies of coal in many sections of my State. Only yesterday I received an urgent request from rural high-school authorities, one of which had only a week's supply on hand and apparently unable to obtain additional supplies.
> In any number of instances schools, and business establishments, to say nothing of dealers, have informed me that they have had coal on order for as long as 4 or 5 months, with no prospect of deliveries because of the lack of supply. Some railroads operating in my State have informed me of the critical situation as it pertains to our transportation system.
> I mention these instances because I am sure that it is apparent to any fair-minded person that since we are in the midst of the winter season we must expect weather conditions to become progressively worse. Certainly an emergency exists as the result of the inaction of those in authority in alleviating the present coal dispute. It is sheer folly to refuse to recognize that this Nation is feeling the pinch of the coal strike. When an agency of the Government, namely, the Interstate Commerce Commission, has publicly declared an emergency, giving railroads top priority on the country's dwindling supply, such an emergency that it is necessary to instruct the railroads to curtail passenger-train service, then it certainly goes beyond mere speculation that all is not well.
> A short time ago seven of the Nation's major railroads were affected by this strike to the extent that one railroad took matters into its own hands even before the Interstate Commerce Commission issued its order, and it arbitrarily confiscated some of the coal passing over its rails. Responsible railway officials have notified the Interstate Commerce Commission members that they had only a few days' stock of locomotive fuel coal and lacked a dependable source of supply.
> Can anyone have an honest opinion that the present coal strike does not affect the substantial part of an entire industry?
> Could anyone having the interests of the common welfare of all our people at heart and not special groups, say that the national health and safety of our people was not in peril?
> It is just that simple, Mr. President. If an entire industry is involved—and it is—if the national health or safety is in peril—and it is—then the Chief Executive is flaunting the laws of the land and denying the people protection provided them by their elected representatives. We must see that those rights are protected.

RECESS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, January 19, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate January 18 (legislative day of January 4), 1950:

ASSISTANT SOLICITOR GENERAL

Abraham J. Harris, of Illinois, to be Assistant Solicitor General, vice Hon. George T. Washington, resigned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 18, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we believe that Thou art God, yet our faith is still unproved by works, our natures still undeveloped by service, and our hearts still fail to overflow with charity.

We believe that we are part of a great plan and are servants of a great purpose that shall carry with it moral victory and spiritual progress. O enable us to bear the yoke of service without complaint and to perform our duty in the spirit of a high privilege.

On this day, so short and so soon to pass, give us courage fearlessly to say the words which witness to righteousness; patiently to do the deeds that strengthen virtue; generously to extend the hand to sustain the weak and give support to all things good. And when the day is ended, bless us all with the quieting consciousness that we have been in the presence of our God. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read:

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: From the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, I have received a subpena duces tecum, directed to me as Clerk of the House of Representatives, to appear before said court on the 19th day of January 1950 at 10 o'clock a. m. as a witness in the case of the United States v. Harold Roland Christoffel (No. 791–47 Criminal Docket), and to bring with me certain and sundry papers therein described in the files of the House of Representatives.

Your attention and that of the House is respectfully invited to a resolution of the House adopted in the Forty-sixth Congress, first session (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 680), upon the recommendation of the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

"Resolved, That no officer or employee of the House of Representatives has the right, either voluntarily or in obedience to a subpena duces tecum, to produce any document, paper, or book belonging to the files of the House before any court or officer, nor to furnish any copy of any testimony given or paper filed in any investigation before the House or any of its committees, or of any paper belonging to the files of the House, except such as may be authorized by statute to be copied and such as the House itself may have made public, to be taken without the consent of the House first obtained."

And to a resolution adopted by the House in the Forty-ninth Congress, first session (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 1295), from which the following is quoted:

"Resolved, That by the privilege of this House no evidence of a documentary character under the control and in possession of the House of Representatives can, by the mandate or process of the ordinary courts of justice, be taken from such control or possession but by its permission.

"That when it appears by the order of a court or of the judge thereof, or of any legal officer charged with the administration of the orders of such court or judge, that documentary evidence in the possession and under the control of the House is needful for use in any court of justice or before any judge or such legal officer for the promotion of justice, this House will take such order thereor as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House."

These resolutions result from the issuance of subpena duces tecum upon the Clerk of the House to produce certain original papers in the files of the House.

Permission to remove from their place or from the custody of the Clerk, any papers, was denied by the House but the court afforded facilities to make certain copies of the papers to be secured from the House. This seems to be the uniform procedure in the case of a subpena duces tecum served upon the Clerk of the House of Representatives to produce original papers from the files of the House.

The subpena in question is herewith attached, and the matter is presented for such action as the House in its wisdom may see fit to take.

Very respectfully yours,
RALPH R. ROBERTS,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, HOLDING A CRIMINAL COURT FOR SAID DISTRICT

THE UNITED STATES V. HAROLD ROLAND CHRISTOFFEL, NO. 791–47, CRIMINAL DOCKET

The President of the United States to Ralph R. Roberts, Clerk, House of Representatives, Eighty-first Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Gwinn, Richard Nixon, John Lesinski, on February 27 and 28 and March 1, 1947.

(b) All records of the votes of said Representatives on said dates.

(c) All records of disbursements made for or on behalf of said Congressmen for salary, travel charges, telephone-toll charges, telegrams, during the months of February and March 1947.

(d) All correspondence or interoffice communications with said Congressmen during said months.

(e) All records of the House Committee on Education and Labor of the Eightieth Congress relating to Harold Roland Christoffel.

(f) All records of the House Committee on Education and Labor of March 1, 1947.

(g) All tally sheets, attendance records, journals, and other documents showing attendance of members of the House Committee on Education and Labor during the months of February and March 1947.

(h) All records of attendance and statements before the House Committee on Education and Labor of one Louis F. Budenz.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 427).

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas in the case of the United States v. Harold Roland Christoffel (No. 791–47, criminal docket), pending in the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, subpena duces tecum was issued by the chief justice of said court and addressed to Ralph R. Roberts, Clerk of the House of Representatives, directing him to appear as a witness before the said court on the 19th day of January 1950, at 10 o'clock antemeridian, and to bring with him certain and sundry papers in the possession and under the control of the House of Representatives: Therefore be it

Resolved, That by the privileges of this House no evidence of a documentary character under the control and in the possession of the House of Representatives can, by the mandate of process of the ordinary courts of justice, be taken from such control or possession but by its permission; be it further

Resolved, That when it appears by the order of the court or of the judge thereof, or of any legal officer charged with the administration of the orders of such court or judge, that documentary evidence in the possession and under the control of the House is needful for use in any court of justice or before any judge or such legal officer, for the promotion of justice, this House will take such order thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House; be it further

Resolved, That Ralph R. Roberts, Clerk of the House, be authorized to appear at the place and before the court named in the subpena duces tecum before mentioned, but shall not take with him any papers or documents on file in his office or under his control or in his possession as Clerk of the House; be it further

Resolved, That when said court determines upon the materiality and the relevancy of the papers and documents called for in the subpena duces tecum then the said court through any of its officers or agents have full permission to attend with all proper parties to the proceeding and then always at any place under the orders and control of this House and take copies of any documents or papers in possession or control of said clerk that the court has found to be material and relevant, except minutes and transcripts of executive sessions, and any evidence of witnesses in respect thereto which the court or other proper officer thereof shall desire, so as, however, the possession of said documents and papers by the said clerk shall not be disturbed, or the same shall not be removed from their file or custody under said clerk; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpena afore-mentioned.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SPECIAL ORDER CONTINUED

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order granted for this afternoon to my colleague from Connecticut [Mr. LODGE] be continued until next Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 428), which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That House Resolution 44, Eighty-first Congress, as amended, providing that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, making a study and analysis of the financial operation of the Panama Canal, shall report its findings not later than January 31, 1950, is hereby amended to extend the time of such report until December 31, 1950.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ARENDS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to explain to the House the reason for the resolution regarding the subpena which was presented today. I refused to deliver any minutes of the Committee on Education and Labor to the attorneys for the reason that I did not think I had authority, because the happenings occurred in the Eightieth Congress. I suggested to the attorneys that if they brought one of their own congressional members from their State they could look at the minutes of the committee, but that I would not release the minutes to the attorneys.

THE POWER OF THE RULES COMMITTEE

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, at a caucus of the Democratic membership of the House held on the 1st of January last year, a resolution was adopted that was binding on the Democratic Members with respect to rule 11 of the rules of the House.

The action taken at that caucus is binding on the Democratic Members for the entire period of the Eighty-first Congress.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is within the province of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other Member of this House to make a flat statement that the Democratic Members of this House are bound by any action that was taken at a former caucus meeting. Many of us have our own conceptions; many of us have our own pledges that we made to our constituents on former occasions. Let me say to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania and to anyone else concerned that I do not consider myself, and I know there are many other Members of this body on this side who do not consider themselves, bound by any action that was taken on a former occasion.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the colloquy between the majority leader and the minority leader is going to confuse the country. The country knows that on Monday those of us who for years have been striving to obtain a vote on FEPC in this House would have had that opportunity should the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. LESINSKI] ask recognition and the Speaker recognize him. By bringing up this resolution on Friday that chance is being wiped out if that resolution passes. No matter the amount of demagoguery used here, you cannot explain this situation to the American people to whom you promised civil rights.

Why is it being brought up on Friday? The gentleman from Illinois has control of that resolution for seven legislative days under the rules; he does not have to call it up until after Monday. Any rumor to the effect that control can be taken away from him is pure sham. A reading of yesterday's RECORD, pages 499 and 500, together with the rule makes it clear that only an arbitrary tearing up of the House rules would take control of the resolution away from him. If you believe in FEPC as you say you do in your platform, if Mr. Truman's speeches are not demagogic, then the responsibility rests with the majority leadership not to call up this resolution and not endanger the only chance to vote on FEPC next Monday.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer in part the short argument made by the gentleman from New York. First, his premise that the gentleman from Illinois may call this resolution up under the 7-day rule is not entirely correct. I believe he will find if he examines the rules and the RECORD of January 17 that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] would be precluded from bringing it up at a later date should the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] insist upon action Thursday or Friday.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARROLL. In view of the 1-minute rule, I cannot yield at this time.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I will say to the gentleman that his statement is not correct.

Mr. CARROLL. There are many other Democrats present who are sincerely interested in passing FEPC and who are also interested in passing other important legislation. A year ago, at the beginning of the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, the Democrats, by caucus action, bound themselves to effect a change in the rules. As a result of that caucus action and with the help of approximately 50 Republicans, we were successful in preventing the Rules Committee from further acting in an arbitrary and an undemocratic manner with reference to reporting out legislation important to the Nation. The real issue before this body is to defeat the pending resolution which is designed to restore the old dictatorial system.

When the time for consideration of FEPC arises, I am confident the Democrats of the North and West will stand together, and we are hopeful that we also shall have support from those forward-looking Republican Members who believe in the teachings and the philosophy of Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That time is Monday, but you are killing that chance. That is what you are doing.

Mr. CARROLL. I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Why not call it up then?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

REA CO-OPS IN ARKANSAS

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I regret to find myself in disagreement with my friend and colleague, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TACKETT], whose statement to the House on Monday concerning the contract of the Arkansas REA co-ops appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date.

The fight to bring rural electrification to the farm people of my section has been a long, hard one, and it is just now coming into full fruition. Up until 15 years ago the farmers in our section were denied the benefits of electricity which their neighbors in the towns were able to receive. They were denied it because the utility companies in the area believed that it was unprofitable to serve them. We had no quarrel with that and went about urging the passage of the rural electrification law and enabling legislation in Arkansas; and the REA co-op movement was born.

In the intervening years much progress has been made. It was my happy privilege on December 21 last, to snap the switch that turned electricity into the one-hundred-thousandth home served by the 18 REA co-ops in our State.

If my memory serves me correctly, 67 percent of our rural people in Arkansas now have the benefits of electricity. It is our problem and our challenge to get electricity to the 33 percent who are still unserved, and to secure for all of them all the electricity which they need at prices which they can afford. To do that, our co-ops must secure the cheapest rate possible, whether from the utility companies who serve the area or from any Government agency which has power for sale. These REA co-ops are competitive enterprises with their roots firmly planted in the rugged soil of individualism in our State. They deserve the same respect and consideration in their efforts to serve their people as the utility companies should have in serving their customers. To require them to come to Congress to get approval for their contracts would certainly be an invasion of their rights to serve their people.

In our efforts to secure a cheaper rate for the farm people of Arkansas, we have urged and supported the construction of all feasible hydroelectric projects to supplement electric energy generated by the steam plants of the local power companies.

Recently, REA co-ops in Arkansas, acting within their moral and legal rights, have made application for a loan to build a steam plant which will be located near the district which I represent. The Congress believing, and I think rightfully so, that all the power generated at all of the hydroelectric dams now in production or to be constructed in the future belongs to all the people, has instructed the Department of the Interior to tie all these dams together and to enter into contracts with public bodies, cooperatives, and private power companies for disposal of the power generated at the dams. The local power companies oppose this and want to buy the power at each dam separately, which for all practical purposes shuts off competition.

At the present time, negotiations are under way not only between the co-ops and the power companies in Arkansas with the Southwestern Power Administration but negotiations are also under way between the local power companies and the REA co-ops looking toward a contract for the purchase of power generated by the hydroelectric plants built by the Government in its flood-control program, and the integration of the hydro power with the generating systems of the REA co-ops and power companies in the local area or both.

I am not familiar with the terms of the contract discussed by my colleague, but I understand that, if consummated as tentatively agreed upon, it will give to the REA co-op users of Arkansas the cheapest rate in the Southwest or perhaps in the United States, and that the steam-generating plant involved will not become the property of the Southwestern Power Administration under the contract.

At any rate, it is my conviction that the REA co-ops are entitled to negotiate with and to contract with the Southwestern Power Administration or the private power companies in the area as they can without having to be forced to come to Congress for approval, and that it is their moral obligation to secure for their consumers the cheapest rate possible in order that they may extend the coverage to all those who are not now receiving service and to give all users all the service which they need. I fear that if the contention of my colleague is upheld by the Congress, or if by reason of it, the Rural Electrification Administration withholds loans for generating plants to the REA co-ops, the long fight for the rural people of Arkansas will receive a blow from which it will not recover and will put them at a great disadvantage in the years ahead.

No one that I know objects to free, competitive enterprise, and I hope the REA co-ops of Arkansas will keep their chins up and fight for a contract that will bring to their users all the power that they need at prices they can afford, whether that contract be with the private utility companies in the area or with the Southwestern Power Administration.

PROPOSED FEPC LEGISLATION

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], I do not think we are in any way endangering the passage of the bill in which the country and the President are so vitally interested, namely, the Federal Fair Employment Practice Act legislation.

It must be remembered that President Roosevelt and President Truman, as well as both the Democratic and Republican Parties have gone on record and have promised to support this legislation.

This morning I read in the press that the Republicans are in favor of FEPC legislation, and in view of that fact, I am calling a meeting this afternoon of the Rules Committee so that they can go on record and vote accordingly. I am confident that we will have four Democrats in favor of the rule on FEPC and this, together with the four Republicans, will make the vote 8 to 4 in favor of a rule; therefore, we are not endangering the passage of FEPC legislation. I am hopeful that the rule will be granted today and that the legislation will come to the floor and be voted on without delay.

As to the question raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], to the effect that FEPC should be called up on Monday, let me state with deference that originally I understood that it would be brought up on Monday under the new 21-day rule. However, the Cox resolution, House Resolution 133, was reported and filed, and if unfortunately passed, would foreclose not only consideration of the FEPC bill on Monday, but also action on the 10 other bills which will be considered under the 21-day rule. On Friday we will have a full membership present and on Monday many are absent. Therefore, by bringing the Cox resolution up on Friday and by defeating same, the FEPC bill will be called up on Monday under the 21-day rule by Chairman LESINSKI, unless something unforeseen occurs in the legislative situation.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

AMENDING RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the meeting of the Committee on Rules this afternoon, I call the attention of the chairman of that committee to the fact that when the committee adjourned on yesterday it adjourned with the understanding that it would meet at 10 o'clock on next Tuesday.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RAMSAY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial appearing in the West Virginia State Medical Journal.

Mr. GATHINGS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two articles.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include two radio speeches he recently delivered.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GAVIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include a letter from Mr. King, of the Guaranty Loan Department of the Veterans' Administration.

Mr. GRAHAM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include five telegrams relating to the coal situation.

THE COAL SITUATION

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to advise, and thus I hope alert, my fellow Congressmen to a realization of the fact that the superlatively selfish reactionary political and financial alliance in our Republic has been quite busy for some time, like a rogue in the night, laying illegitimate propaganda babies upon the doorsteps of some of the unsuspecting, sleeping Americans, and among said babies is the following:

By blaming John L. Lewis and his United Mine Workers and not the coal barons, mine owners, and operators of the Nation for causing or threatening to cause the banking or putting out of the fires in the factories and homes of America by failing, neglecting, and refusing to bargain collectively, honestly, and in good faith with Mr. Lewis and his miners, and jamming the listening posts of America with calamity howling that the wheels of industry will stop for want of coal and the home fires of America will sputter out, until today the conjured-up cold causes the substitute teeth of some people to chatter and their aging knees to knock in unison until you cannot distinguish any more the old clippity clop in the mule-train song from the noises these calamity howlers are making, all to the great detriment of hill mountain and plain billy music. I am today placing this and other instances of illegitimate propaganda baby placing in the Appendix of the RECORD and invite all of you Congressmen and others to read same.

COAL SHORTAGE IN NEW ENGLAND

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include certain letters and information regarding the coal situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the coal shortage in New England is a serious situation and is getting worse each day. Mr. J. Leonard Johnson, president of the New England Fuel Dealers Association, has written to me and to the President for help and I shall put his letters in the RECORD. I shall also put in the RECORD quotations from Saward's Journal of January 14 which states:

> BOSTON, January 12.—More instances have come to light this week of the strangle hold that John Lewis has on the coal industry, and it is now pretty well manifest that if the curtailment in production continues some consumers are going to be in serious condition before the month is out.

The New England Fuel Dealers Association states that an emergency exists and that steps should be taken at once to prevent suffering from lack of heat and unemployment from lack of coal. The Lowell Sun says a cold wave might bring widespread suffering, and rationing of coal has begun in some areas. The president of the Hood Rubber Co., at Watertown, Mass., asks for our best efforts to bring an end to the coal strike to prevent the closing down of Hood and other rubber companies.

NEW ENGLAND FUEL DEALERS ASSOCIATION, INC.,
Boston, Mass., December 30, 1949.

Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS,
United States Congresswoman, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MADAM: It is apparent to everyone in the coal business that 3 days per week operation at the mines does not furnish enough coal to take care of normal winter demands.

In the last few weeks, inventories in the hands of dealers have been shrinking very rapidly. With the advent of cold weather, many dealers will be entirely without coal. Unless action is taken immediately to assure adequate supplies from the mines, widespread suffering is apt to result.

I enclose copy of a letter sent to the President of the United States, which bears on this subject.

I hope that you will use your influence to secure action.

Very truly yours,

J. L. JOHNSON,
President.

NEW ENGLAND FUEL DEALERS ASSOCIATION, INC.,
Boston, Mass., December 29, 1949.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
President of United States of America, the White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In the newspapers and on the radio last week, you were quoted as saying, in effect, that you would take the necessary action if the coal situation reached the emergency stage. I heartily approve of your determination to act, but I am afraid that we may differ as to what constitutes the emergency stage.

I am reminded of the story which we used to read when we were children about the little Dutch boy who discovered a hole in the dike through which the water was seeping from the ocean on the outside of the dike. He put his thumb in the hole and kept it there effectively stopping the flow of water until others could come and repair the damaged dike. The little Dutch boy, while probably knowing that the amount of water flowing through the little hole of itself would do no great damage, realized that without immediate action on his part the hole would gradually grow until the water came through in torrents and the countryside would be flooded. The emergency existed although the immediate consequences were not great. If immediate action had not been taken, it is probable that the dike would have been demolished and irremedial damage caused.

The present emergency stage of the coal situation, of course, is much more advanced than that discovered by the little Dutch boy. Irremediable damage will soon be with us unless effective steps are taken immediately to prevent it.

An emergency exists, in my opinion, when current economic forces will bring widespread hardship and suffering unless curbed. It is not dependent upon the actual present existence of hardship and suffering.

Unless the present forces at play in the coal business are checked, it is inevitable that people will suffer from lack of heat, that factories will close from lack of fuel, and their employees thrown out of employment.

On behalf of the fuel dealers of New England, and the people who are dependent, directly or indirectly, upon coal for their livelihood and comfort, I urge you to recognize immediately the existence of an emergency and to take such steps as will assure the people of an adequate supply of their vitally necessary fuel.

Respectfully yours,

J. L. JOHNSON,
President.

NEW ENGLAND AND BOSTON NEWS

BOSTON MARKET: COAL RECEIPTS REFLECT SHORT WEEK—DOMESTIC ANTHRACITE GROWING SCARCE

BOSTON, January 12.—More instances have come to light this week of the strangle hold that John Lewis has on the coal industry, and it is now pretty well manifest that if the curtailment in production continues some consumers are going to be in serious condition before the month is out.

Receipts of bituminous coal during the week ended December 31 reflected the output of the 2-day work week, having totaled but 264,998 net tons, a drop of 66,064 tons from the preceding week and, 78,819 tons less than the corresponding week last year. It brought receipts for the calendar year up to 11,534,493 tons, compared with 20,380,125 tons for the year 1948, a drop of 8,845,627 tons. The receipts for the coal year to December 31 amounted to 7,641,240 tons, compared with 15,761,926 tons received in the corresponding period of the preceding coal year, a drop of 8,120,666 tons.

Receipts of anthracite during the final week of 1949 amounted to only 66,100 tons and that brought the receipts since April 1 up to 3,165,803 tons, compared with 4,024,420 tons received in the corresponding period of the previous coal year, a drop of 858,617 tons.

Although no householder has yet been forced to live in a cold house because domestic fuel is not available, it is a fact that many users are getting down to the bottom of the bins and many dealers throughout New England have little or none of the sizes of anthracite mostly wanted. Stove is very scarce and nut and egg, which most dealers have had, are now disappearing in some places.

The big shippers of soft coal to this market, who have managed up to this time to offer a satisfactory substitute to their customers when their regular coals were not available, now fear that, because of the so-called unauthorized strikes that have occurred this week, even these substitutes will be scarce in another week or two.

Consumers have substantial tonnage

It is true that there is still a fairly substantial tonnage of bituminous coal in the hands of New England consumers but it is not at all evenly divided, and a sizable tonnage of reserve coal in Maine does not help the consumer in southern New England who is running out of coal. Based on inquiries that have come to shippers this week, there is a greater shortage of bituminous coal in southern New England than in the more northerly area.

Whether it was due to a smaller supply of coal, or to a lessened need by consumers, is not clear, but the shipments from the New England tidewater terminals declined during the week ended December 24. The six railroads serving these terminals loaded 508 cars, compared with 605 cars the preceding week, and 814 cars in the corresponding week last year. This brought the car shipments for 1949 to December 24 up to 24,367 cars, compared with 41,273 last year.

Prices on bituminous coal at the docks here have been advanced this week. The shippers found it necessary to pay higher prices at the mines to get coal and passed this on to consumers. For standard grade mine-run at Boston the prices now range $11.70 to $11.90 net ton on cars or trucks, with most dock operators holding for or near the higher price. Little domestic mine-run is offered now under $12.15. Low volatile inch-and-a-quarter nut and slack ranges $11.50 to $11.65 and medium volatile nut and slack is firm at $11. Low volatile pea is $13 to $13.25, and high volatile pea is generally quoted at $13, although one or two houses are still open to orders at 25 cents less. Medium volatile stoker is offered at $13.25.

Following the advance in wholesale price, retail distributors throughout Greater Boston have upped their prices on bituminous coal 50 cents a ton—$14.95 for mine-run, $14.50 for nut and slack, $16.25 for low volatile pea, and $16 for high volatile pea.

No changes have been made in retail anthracite prices here, the prevailing price in the Boston area for white ash egg, stove and nut being $23.50 per net ton delivered, plus $1 for carry where necessary.

Price of kerosene has been advanced to 9.8 cents per gallon tank cars and 13.9 cents tank wagon in the greater Boston area.

NEW ENGLAND FACES GROWING COAL SHORTAGE—WIDESPREAD SUFFERING LIKELY IF COLD WAVE HITS THIS AREA—RATIONING ALREADY STARTED BY DEALERS IN SOME SECTIONS AS SUPPLY DROPS

BOSTON, January 13.—New England faced a growing coal shortage today. Dealers said a cold wave might bring widespread suffering. Rationing already has begun by dealers in some areas.

A direct appeal has been made to President Truman by Senator LEVERETT SALTONSTALL (Republican, Massachusetts) after receipt of pleas from the president of the New England Fuel Dealers Association and from a leading coal transporter whose Boston docks now have scarcely a day's supply ahead.

ASKS ACTION

J. L. Johnson, of Boston, the fuel dealers' organization head, asked the President to take steps to assure the people an adequate supply of coal.

Three-days-a-week mine operation does not meet normal winter demands for coal, he said.

In his communication, sent by Senator SALTONSTALL to the President, Johnson wrote:

"In the last few weeks inventories in the hands of dealers have been shrinking very rapidly. With the advent of cold weather many dealers will be entirely without coal.

"Unless action is taken immediately to assure adequate supplies from the mines, widespread suffering is apt to result."

In Boston, Johnson said, "a few days of cold weather and many dealers will be out of anthracite."

BAD REPORTS

From northern and central New England, particularly, came reports of growing shortage.

The president of C. H. Sprague & Son Co., Richard Bowditch, operating a line of colliers into Boston, said:

"If it had not been for the heavy oil conversion and the unseasonable weather we would have been in great trouble in this area at this time."

Both Waltham and Quincy dealers forecast serious coal shortages should the cold weather continue many days.

Three of the four major coal dealers in Claremont, N. H., reported anthracite stocks so low they have resorted to rationing.

Two suppliers deliver only a ton at a time and a third is cutting deliveries to a ton or less. Another reported only enough on hand for a 2 weeks' supply.

SOFT COAL

Soft-coal supplies, however, were reported fair to good. But both hard and soft coal was in short supply in Portsmouth, N. H. Three big dealers said it was a very definite scarcity and a wholesaler termed the situation "even dangerous."

Maine, too, was suffering from lack of both hard and soft coal. A spokesman for Randall & McAllister Co., Portland, one of the State's biggest wholesalers and retailers, said anthracite was particularly low.

The company serves dealers in northern New Hampshire as well as Maine.

Some of the dealers were reported either entirely out of anthracite or with less than a week's supply.

The company's sales manager said only the recent unseasonably warm weather kept the situation from being more critical.

Many Augusta dealers are low on both hard and soft coal. None has put in rationing so far. But one dealer said supplies of soft coal for those requiring large quantities were being halved.

General Maine Power said there appeared to be no serious shortage at its steam-generation plants as they are equipped to use oil, too, and are doing so to save on coal.

WATERTOWN, MASS., January 18, 1950.

EDITH N. ROGERS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

Duquesne Light & Power Co., Pittsburgh, Pa., must suspend operations Friday, January 20, due to lack of coal. This company furnishes power to St. Joseph Lead Co., second largest producer of zinc oxide, an important and necessary compound in the manufacture of rubber goods. The shutting down of St. Joseph Lead Co. will cause serious repercussions in the rubber industry and if continu d will necessitate the closing down of Hood and other rubber-manufacturing companies in a short time. This specific situation is indicative of many others which will result if the coal strike continues. Believe you should use your best efforts to bring an end to the coal strike as soon as possible and promote legislation which will prevent a recurrence.

C. L. MUNCH,
President, Hood Rubber Co.

THE COAL SHORTAGE

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, this morning telegrams began pouring into my office from both heads of manufacturing plants in our district and also representatives of coal merchant associations. These all have reference to the critical coal shortage in our district. Under leave to file some of these telegrams, this need will be made apparent in the RECORD. The Twenty-fifth Pennsylvania District is one of the largest industrial districts in the world. If my memory serves me right, it is the fourth industrial district in Pennsylvania and the eighth in the United States.

Yesterday the Duquesne Light Co., of Pittsburgh, Pa., which supplies electric power throughout the area, notified over 300 major industrial plants that they must shut down voluntarily starting Friday night. This action was caused by an electric power shortage resulting from the coal walk-outs in the mines, and that if the situation does not improve quickly that other steps would be necessary; the first, that this appeal would go out to all of its 3,000 industrial consumers, and then due to the fact that there is only a 12-day supply of coal on hand, that a request would be made of private consumers that they ration their electric power on a voluntary basis. This will not only throw thousands of men out of work but will also affect hundreds of homes wherein stokers are used and oil-burning furnaces that depend upon electricity for their operation.

Mr. Speaker, the President is quoted as saying that in his opinion, no coal crisis exists which would justify his taking action under the national emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. Surely, the President is not cognizant of the situation such as I have just stated.

I join with the other Members of the House of Representatives who are seeking to bring to the President accurate information to show that he is mistaken in his belief that a national emergency does not exist.

In my judgment, if he does not act quickly great hardship will result.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, in all this discussion that has been taking place in regard to the rules, one very important standing rule of this House is being completely forgotten. Under the rules that were adopted at the beginning of this session, every Wednesday is a Calendar Wednesday, on which the Speaker of the House can call the names of the committees in order, and the chairman of any committee called, under instructions from the committee, can bring up any bill that has been favorably acted upon in that committee.

Over and over again the leadership in this House has asked unanimous consent to pass over Calendar Wednesday. Under that standing rule, if the administration in power here and the majority party wishes to bring onto the floor of the House a bill that has been favorably reported by a committee, regardless of any action taken by the Committee on Rules, it can do so.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR., asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances, in one to include an article from the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin of January 16, 1950, entitled "Australians See a Bigger Future Minus Socialism," and in the other to include an article by David Lawrence entitled "What Is Right in the Left."

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances with reference to the Panama Canal and include extraneous matter.

PERMISSION TO EXTEND REMARKS AT THIS POINT

Mr. MARTIN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] be permitted to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, we are hearing a lot about bonuses for veterans. Yesterday I introduced a bill which I think should have thorough consideration along with any other proposed bonus bills. Mr. Speaker, my bill allows each veteran income exemption for Federal tax purposes in the amount of $25 for each 6 months of honorable service or a major fraction thereof for himself and the same for each dependent.

Now, let us see what that would amount to for a veteran who served 3 years 9 months and 5 days. This would amount to eight exemption periods, since he served eight periods of 6 months or major fraction thereof. Therefore he would have for himself an exemption for income-tax purposes of $200 per year as long as he lives. Now, let us suppose that he has a wife and two children, which is considered the average American family. Under those conditions, he would have 4 times 8 exemptions, or 32, which would allow him $800 exemption on his income for tax purposes. Just how much money this would amount to would depend upon how much income the veteran had.

Major arguments in favor of my bill are:

First. No revenue would be taken from the Government.

Second. No large staff of Federal employees would be necessary to handle the disposal of such revenue, since the revenue would never leave the veteran's pockets. He would be allowed to keep it. He could not speculate or lose all of his bonus money overnight for it would be an annual convenience for him as long as he lives, perhaps in the amount of some $200 per year.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that an annual benefit of this nature would be less expensive to the Federal Government and would be of maximum benefit to the veteran. I am sure the veterans and their families would receive more satisfaction from this sort of a bonus over their lifetime than any other form of bonus possible. Since this bill, of necessity, is being referred to the Ways and Means Committee, I am asking the members of that committee to give it their most serious consideration.

THE DEMOCRATIC LEADERSHIP IS STALLING ON FEPC

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, today is Calendar Wednesday. In line with what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HERTER] has just said, I now suggest to the majority leadership of this House that, rather than attempt to prevent and thwart a vote on FEPC, today, here and now, on this Calendar Wednesday they call up the FEPC bill from the Committee on Education and Labor—the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from Michiman, is on the floor—and that action be taken on it forthwith to stop this stalling and this hypocrisy.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, for the last 18 years except two, the Democratic Party has been in control of all three branches of the Government, legislative, judicial, and executive. Now, it came as something of a shock to me—I have always admired the Democratic Party and the members of that party—to learn from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], the party either is—I will not say incompetent, but that it just cannot operate without help from the Republicans. You are in an awful state, are you not? It is just too bad. But I am sure some Republicans will be able to assist the cause of good government.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Yes, if I may have as long a minute, as some gentlemen had yesterday.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman take the position that the Republican Party does not have its own responsibilities?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Sure we have.

Mr. McCORMACK. Then the gentleman's statement falls to the ground.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. As far as I am concerned, the gentleman knows my attitude on FEPC and on the rule.

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes, I know.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Cannot the gentleman get Democrats enough to go along with him?

Mr. McCORMACK. What about the promise of the gentleman's party? There are four Republican members on the Committee on Rules, who have a responsibility.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Does the gentleman still have to come squawking to us for help?

Under permission granted to extend my remarks, I include a radio talk as follows:

THE HOUSE RULES COMMITTEE PROMOTES ECONOMY AND EFFICIENCY

Friends and fellow Americans, this is your Congressman, CLARE E. HOFFMAN, calling all members of the junior chambers of commerce, who are asking for the adoption of legislation recommended by the Hoover Commission.

Our people, aware of the extravagance and inefficiency of the present administration at Washington, realize that national bankruptcy is knocking at the door.

The members of the junior chambers of commerce know that national bankruptcy means a disastrous depression, suffering and want, the loss of the individual's freedom.

Being young men, they know that the major part of the burden of paying for the administration's extravagance and inefficiency will fall upon them, their children—even unto the third and fourth generations.

Because of this knowledge, the members of the junior chambers of commerce have been holding meetings throughout the district, and no doubt elsewhere, urging the people to write their Senators and Congressmen, to make effective by legislation, the recommendations of the Hoover Commission.

Although your drive is all to the good, may I suggest there is no need to write me on that subject. I have always voted for economy and efficiency in the Federal Government, and intend to continue so to do.

Now, to aid the junior chambers of commerce in their drive for economy and efficiency, let me call attention to an additional and far more effective method of achieving that end. That is, to support the pending effort to restore to the House Rules Committee the power to screen legislation which it is proposed to bring before the House. Restore to that committee the power to apply the legislative brakes to the proposals of the spenders.

It is the primary duty of the Rules Committee to program the legislation which is to come before the House, to keep from the floor of the House proposed legislation which would be unworkable, wasteful, and detrimental to the public welfare.

If anyone of the 435 Members of the House, or if any committee of the House could force a vote in the House on his or the committee's pet measure or hobby, many a bill unworkable, calling for unnecessary appropriations, would be enacted into law.

You ask why that apparent absurdity exists—it exists because Members of Congress are subjected to terrific pressure by groups representing special interests wanting Federal funds for some desirable, but unnecessary or excessively costly measure.

Let me cite an example: Secretary Tobin recommends a pension of $100 for everyone. However desirable, a moment's thought shows that the Federal Government does not have and cannot obtain, without ruinous taxation, sufficient funds to pay that kind of a pension to everyone.

Because of pressure which would be put upon Congressmen not only by needy and deserving individuals, but also by people who do not think, such a bill could, under the present rules, be, by a committee chairman, brought before the House, and the House, its individual Members, under direct pressure, might pass the bill. But that kind of bill would never get through the Rules Committee. Nor would a petition for its consideration get the signatures of a majority of the Members.

Do I hear you ask: "But why should we permit a Rules Committee to gag the House?" Now, listen my good friends, and no longer be deceived, if you have been deceived, by the false propaganda of the lobbyists who favor an unlimited spending program. The Rules Committee never has and it cannot gag the House. The House is the boss. Always under the rule, when 218 Members of the House, that is, a majority, show they want to vote upon a particular bill by signing a petition, that bill must come before the House for a vote.

All the Rules Committee does, all it can do, is to safeguard the interests of the people, as a whole, by screening legislation, throwing out the unworkable, impracticable bills, introduced by some Congressman to promote his hobby—the program of some special group.

One other thing, the Rules Committee does—it protects a Member of Congress from being required to vote for measures which he knows are detrimental to the national welfare, but which, because of peculiar circumstances or special interests in his own legislative district, he might otherwise, because of political expediency, support.

Now the surest and the quickest remedy for the present excessive wasteful spending of the taxpayers' money is to restore the power of the Rules Committee.

So, in all sincerity, and with the utmost earnestness, I say to you, members of the junior chambers of commerce, and to all others who want to prevent a disastrous depression, support this effort to restore to the Rules Committee, authority to separate the wheat from the chaff, aid Congressmen in getting worth-while, constructive legislation as recommended by the Hoover Commission. But keep the Congressmen off the political spot upon which politically minded, Treasury-raiding groups would put them.

EXCISE TAXES

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOLLEFSON. Mr. Speaker, I take the time of the House again to call to the attention of the Members, the demand of the people for relief from the burdensome wartime excise taxes. I have received from the people of my congressional district some 3,200 letters, telegrams, cards, and so forth, urging Congress to repeal these taxes. It is to be presumed that other Members have received as many or more like requests for tax relief and it is not my purpose to claim any kind of a record. But if other Members have been as deluged as I have with this kind of mail, then most certainly we have ample evidence of public demand for action by Congress to grant some measure of relief from these so-called luxury taxes.

During the war years the people did not mind paying these taxes because they knew that the revenue was needed to meet the war emergency. They realized also that another primary objective of such taxes was to discourage civilian consumption and civilian production of items in competition with the defense program for materials and men. They were perfectly willing to pay increased taxes and to forego the consumption of luxury items if it was in the best interests of the war effort.

But the war has been over for about 5 years and the same justification for these taxes no longer remains. Most certainly that is true with respect to those articles which by no stretch of the imagination could ever have been considered luxuries, such as: Baby oils, powders and lotions, electric light bulbs, numerous gas and electric appliances, leather goods, lubricating oils, transportation, and many other items. There is no good reason for continuing the fiction that these things are luxuries when they are actually necessities.

These excise taxes in many instances are actually a deterrent to business activity and employment. With the cost of living still high many people refrain or are prohibited from buying products which they want and need. The purchase price, together with the tax, is prohibitive. Representatives of industry have informed me that decreases in the volume of their sales can be directly attributed to this factor. Verification of that fact comes from members of organized labor who tell me that the tax has caused some unemployment.

Retention of all these excise taxes does not represent sound fiscal management. High rates of taxes do not necessarily of themselves mean increased revenue to the Government. On the contrary, history points to instances when a high rate may tend to reduce revenues. If there are fewer sales of highly taxed items simply because people do not want to pay the taxes it should be obvious that revenues will decrease. Likewise, some relief from payment of burdensome taxes may result in increased revenues.

We might benefit from Canada's experience in this regard. The Canadian Government accorded similar tax relief despite the belief on the part of some that the beneficial results thereof would be doubtful. Time has proven the wisdom of the course taken. Canada's tax revenues are now exceeding its expenditures.

Several measures have been introduced providing for tax relief. They are presently pending before the Ways and Means Committee. I urge all Members who are interested in excise-tax relief to exert every effort to secure early and favorable action by that committee, so that the membership of the House may have an opportunity to vote on this much-requested, and I might say demanded, legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I include in my remarks a resolution of the National Committee for the Repeal of Wartime Excise Taxes with offices in New York:

RESOLUTION

Whereas the undersigned have associated themselves together as a committee of principals under the name National Committee for Repeal of Wartime Excise Taxes for the purpose of undertaking to secure the repeal of the discriminatory wartime excise taxes so as to leave in effect only the pre-1941 excises, and have included in their objective all such excises except those on alcohol, tobacco, and gasoline, and

Whereas this committee of principals believes that these unfair and discriminatory taxes should be repealed for the following reasons, among others:

1. The strongest reason for their enactment was that they were admittedly repressive and would put a brake on the businesses affected. They were intentionally diversionary and punitive in order to meet wartime necessities. Since they continue to repress and to divert in peacetime, they are discriminatory and unfair.

2. They are rationing by taxation—the last of the wartime controls.

3. They dictate to the consumer how he shall spend his dollar; a severe limitation on his freedom of choice.

4. Since they strike deeply into whole communities and particular businesses, their unfairness causes bitterness when unemployment results to the individual worker.

5. The Congress has a moral commitment to the American people to end the high wartime excise taxes. This pledge is woven through the laws, their legislative history, and the very logic of their original enactment.

6. Since they increase prices to the consumer, they produce a maximum of mass irritation at a minimum of return, with their greatest impact on the low-income group, least able to pay.

7. Because they are arbitrarily selective by peacetime standards, they have injured particular industries.

8. More people and more businesses are subjected to the repeated bite of these taxes than any other, without exception.

9. Consumer spending (which we must increase in order to sustain high-level employment) is decreased by these taxes.

10. The term "luxury taxes" is misleading, confusing, and in fact false, since the wartime excise taxes were not imposed on luxuries. They were imposed on goods and services that interfered with wartime necessities.

11. Only complete repeal (restoration of the pre-1941 status) can be effective; mere reduction in rates would be a serious mistake—the irritant would remain; the moral commitment would be unfulfilled; the discrimination and unfairness would continue.

12. These are bad taxes; they are placed on gross revenues not on net profits.

13. If it is wrong to keep the discriminatory wartime rates, and right to repeal them, America cannot afford not to do the right.

14. Tax-repeal action rather than public works is the only way to reach the skills unemployed by consumer resistance to wartime excise taxes.

15. If these taxes are now repealed, the Government will have exerted itself positively in the direction of continued high-level employment and increasing national income throughout 1950.

16. When taxes enacted for an emergency purpose are permitted to remain after the emergency has passed, the faith of the people in their Government is shaken.

17. Because of the general belief that these taxes will be repealed, quick action to this end is necessary, as the public is curtailing its purchases of many products and services in the affected industries: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the National Committee for the Repeal of Wartime Excise Taxes, That the aforesaid unfair and discriminatory excises should be repealed, and the pre-1941 status restored at the earliest possible date.

This 12th day of January 1950.

NATIONAL COMMITTEE FOR REPEAL OF WARTIME EXCISE TAXES.

THE KOREAN AID BILL

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, in company with three other Members of Congress, I had an opportunity to visit Korea this last December. I do want to bring to my colleagues my reaction upon this bill which proposes to make $150,000,000 available to Korea.

Korea, as you must know, was split at the thirty-eighth parallel in a secret agreement made with the Russians either at Potsdam or Yalta. The northern part of Korea, with about 9,500,000 population, is under the complete control of Communist Russia. The southern part of Korea, with about 28,000,000 people, is called the Republic of Korea. This country has been supporting southern Korea, having had a considerable army there until a few months ago. At the present time, we have about 500 officers and men who are training a Korean Army of about a hundred thousand men. We had an opportunity to review these troops. They look like tough, hard-fighting individuals. I understand that most of them are "trigger happy" and they are equipped with light rifles, a few cannons, and a dozen old observation planes which we left with them. I do believe that I am not violating any military secrets when I say that General Roberts, who represents our Government, stated before a rather large group that it was not any longer "if" the Communists move in, but "when" they move on southern Korea. It is understood the northern Communist army is being equipped with heavy tanks and fighting material. When they do move in, south Korea could last about 8 or 10 days.

Mr. Speaker, I noticed in the last ECA report of the December 30 issue, No. 71, page 5, that the ECA has authorized $10,900,000 for power plants, fertilizer plants, and money to build dams which will permit the irrigation of an additional 27,000 acres of land in Korea. It is my understanding that the bill under consideration today will make money available for fertilizer plants and other permanent improvements which, when the Communists take over, would be of great benefit to the Russians.

I call your attention to the fact that the won, while it is officially 450 to the dollar, it can be had on the street at the rate of 900 to the dollar.

Mr. Speaker, I refer you to a press release by Doctor Jessup, dated January 13, from Seoul, Korea, in which Doctor Jessup refused a direct reply when a Korean reporter asked what the United States would do if the Korean Republic faced imminent Communist aggression as does Formosa. I would also refer you to a statement in the New York Times of Sunday, January 14, in which the price of rice has doubled in the past 6 months, and during the last few days has been rising about 6 percent daily. It would seem from this article that there is a run-away inflation.

It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, that the State Department has no intention of interfering when the Communists move in to take over southern Korea. If that conclusion is correct, then I ask the question, "Is it wise for this country to invest $150,000,000 in Korea?" It is my understanding that the State Department and the policies of this Government is to keep hands off and let the Communists take Korea and most of Asia. I have every sympathy for southern Korea. President Rhee and his Cabinet are doing their best to establish a republic. I was greatly impressed with the statement made by the American chairman of the National Assembly when he spoke to us on our visit to their legislative body. His remarks were as follows:

ADDRESS OF P. H. SHINICKY, CHAIRMAN, NATIONAL ASSEMBLY, REPUBLIC OF KOREA

Ladies and gentlemen, I consider it a great honor for me to say a few words of welcome in honor of the Congressmen and the officials of the United States.

Although the United States and Korea are separated by the Pacific Ocean, they have been as close in relationship as brothers. Especially after the liberation, the United States has been the main supporter of the independence of Korea, and she has also favored Korea as the first recipient of the Marshall-plan aid. We cannot be too grateful for these things.

While other material supplies are highly important for the rehabilitation of Korea, the American military aid can be considered most important and urgent for her. We, the Korean people, are fighting every day against the Communist aggression, and our zeal to defend our fatherland against the impact of the communism is indeed invincible, but we have no munitions and arms with which to fight the aggressors. We do not expect other people to defend our country; we want to defend it with our own lives. But in doing so we must have arms. God helps those who help themselves. We will sacrifice our lives for our country. Therefore, we are earnestly appealing to the United States for aid in ammunition.

It is my conviction that the moral and material support from the United States and the United Nations comes to Korea, not as aiming to revive Korea alone from its struggle, but as being motivated by the sense of the fundamental principle of mutual help among mankind. The world is one—nations of the world are now linked together—they are inseparable in their affairs. If, by the help of the United States and the United Nations, Korea should become the bulwark in the Orient against communism, it would not only be a fortunate thing for the Koreans, but also a great contribution to the United States and, further, to the United Nations. Korea, well defended, will contribute its part to the peace of the world.

May God's blessings be on you Members of the Congress and the officials of the United States in your trip through the Orient. I thank you.

Mr. Speaker, you will note that its principal plea is for military aid. He says we must have arms. It does not seem to be the purpose of this appropriation to supply arms and fighting equipment to Korea. It does not seem that the permanent capital improvements is the proper direction we should travel if we are really to give Korea the help they need.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. ST. GEORGE asked and was given permission to extend her remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware (at the request of Mr. KEATING) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. KEATING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include certain extraneous matter.

RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I am amazed at the lack of familiarity with the rules of the House just exhibited by our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR.], former national chairman of the Republican Party. In the first place, he knows that Calendar Wednesday, as of today, has already been dispensed with by unanimous consent; and in the second place, he knows that Calendar Wednesday can only be dispensed with by unanimous consent. If the gentleman were diligent in his duties and was on the floor of the House and wanted to see business in order on Calendar Wednesday go ahead under the rules of the House, he can do so at any time by objecting to dispensing with Calendar Wednesday. Any one Member can achieve that end.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIEMILLER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. The gentleman has made an incorrect statement. The majority leader has submitted that unanimous-consent request to the House and all he has to do at this time is to resubmit the question and ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday business be in order today. But I have not heard him do so.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BIEMILLER. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, that is a further illustration of one of the weirdest and strangest states of mind that I have ever heard of in my years in this body, and that is to resubmit a unanimous-consent request now under the conditions that exist.

The statement that the gentleman made is absolutely correct. He knows that Calendar Wednesday business can only be dispensed with by unanimous consent, and he knows, or ought to have known, that it had been dispensed with as far as this Wednesday is concerned.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. I am only suggesting a way by which the FEPC matter can be brought up today.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BIEMILLER] has expired.

REA STEAM-GENERATING PROGRAM

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAGEE. Mr. Speaker, on Monday my good friend and colleague, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TACKETT], made an unwarranted attack on the Southwestern Power Administration and the policy of the Rural Electrification Administration in making loans for the building of generating plants and transmission lines. He introduced H. R. 6782, which has for its purpose the prohibiting of loans by the Rural Electrification Administration for building plants or lines to be owned, leased, used, or operated by other than the rural electric cooperatives, unless the consent of Congress is obtained. By this means he seeks to hamstring the rural electrification program; and his bill is contrary to the interests of the 160,000 members of our rural electric cooperatives in Missouri, as well as inimical to the 90,000 in my State who are awaiting electric service. In fact, it is a blow to the rural people all over this Nation.

When I was home after adjournment of the first session of the Eighty-first Congress, I was besieged almost daily by delegations of farmers who have been trying for years to obtain electricity but who have not yet received this most necessary service. The gentleman from Arkansas has seen fit to take up the cudgel of the private utilities who have tried to destroy the REA program by every means at their command. I do not believe that the membership of this House will be misled by the attack that has been made upon this program, because the whole economy and welfare of our farm population is at stake.

The gentleman from Arkansas says that he is a great friend of the farmer and a firm believer in REA, and then he introduces a bill which would practically nullify this program. He blows both hot and cold in the same breath.

Aesop mentioned in one of his fables about two travelers who were going down a highway on a cold, wintry day. They came finally to an old tavern and decided to have a cup of coffee. As they were seated at the table waiting to be served, one of the travelers raised his hands to his mouth and blew upon them. Whereupon, his companion said to him: "Why do you blow upon your hands?" "To warm them," said the other. After the coffee had been served, the same traveler who had blown upon his hands to warm them, raised the cup of coffee to his mouth and blew upon it. Again his companion spoke and said: "Why do you blow upon the coffee?" Whereupon the other answered: "To cool it." "Farewell," said the other, "I must bid you adieu. I have no faith in any man who blows both hot and cold in the same breath."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GORDON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an article from the International Teamster on labor unions in Nazi Germany and Soviet Russia by Edward Walsh.

Mr. BISHOP asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a statement made before the Appropriations Committee today.

Mr. WOODRUFF asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper article.

Mr. MARCANTONIO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an article written by him.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MULTER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

DISCRIMINATION IN THE ARMED FORCES

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, I hope that on Monday of next week this House will call up for final action, the FEPC bill that has been receiving so much attention throughout the country.

At this time I want to direct your attention to the fact that one more step in the right direction to eliminate discrimination in this Nation has been taken by the Army, pursuant to an order issued by Gen. Gordon Gray. He has issued an order which requires that Negro troops be integrated into every branch of the service, taking into consideration only their qualifications, their ability, and their competence to do the particular job required of the rating or rank to which they may be assigned or commissioned.

Last year I introduced a bill in this House which would attempt to accomplish the same purpose in the National Guard. It has not even had a hearing. I hope it will get a hearing at this session and be reported to this House so that the National Guard, which in time of war, is an integral part of our Army, may be brought up to the same level as the Army, the Navy, and the Air Force in accordance with the direction of the President, and those subordinate to him.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MULTER. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I introduced a resolution which seeks a complete inquiry into the extent to which the armed services, particularly the Army, have met the tests laid down by the President and the Secretary of Defense, in respect to this question of equality of opportunity and treatment in the armed forces. Does the gentleman see anything inconsistent in his position and in the proposition suggesting that Congress, in the exercise of its legislative oversight, should ascertain and be sure that these great policies have been, are being, and will be fully carried out in all three branches of the armed services, including the Army?

Mr. MULTER. If the assurances that I have received are correct, and I have no reason to believe that they are not, I do not see any need for the gentleman's investigation. If integration by occupation and talent has been functioning in the Navy and the Air Force, as I have been assured it has been, there is no need to investigate in those branches of the armed services. If, pursuant to General Gray's direction, the same thing happens in the Army, again there is no need for an investigation. If the gentleman has any information that indicates that those assurances I have received are not in accordance with the fact, then, of course, his investigation should be conducted.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MULTER. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. It is a fact, is it not, that there still are segregated Negro units in the Army even under the present order of Secretary Gray? I do agree, however, that the Department of the Army has been at long last making some real efforts to deal with the problem. It is a fact, though, that segregated units remain. In view therefore of the long time it has taken even to get to even this stage, have we in the Congress not a right to ask that the whole process which is now said to be continuing in a more opportune way, that the whole process should be subject to legislative oversight?

Mr. MULTER. Separate units necessarily will continue until this order can be implemented and carried into effect. But you cannot expect that these Negro units are going to be disbanded at once; these men must be integrated into their proper places where they can be used in other units. I believe that the purpose and aim of General Gray's order is to accomplish just that, but it certainly cannot be done overnight. If there should be delay in its being accomplished, or if this order should be eyewash—and we have been assured that it is not eyewash—then, of course, the gentleman's investigation must go forward.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield still further? And I promise not to interrupt him further.

Mr. MULTER. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. The Air Force and the Navy have actually eliminated segregated units, whereas the Army has not.

Mr. MULTER. And the Coast Guard did likewise.

Mr. JAVITS. Those three services have eliminated them.

Mr. MULTER. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. The Army has not done so.

Mr. MULTER. Not yet.

Mr. JAVITS. Certainly we have the right to know why.

Mr. MULTER. We do know that fact; I am expressing the hope that this order will very quickly accomplish the same result in the Army that has been accomplished in the other services.

It is appropriate at this time to call to your attention while we are talking and thinking about FEPC, that 10 States have enacted antidiscrimination statutes.

Eight additional States have legislation on their books now which forbid discrimination in the National Guard. Last year the State of New York became one of the eight which enacted such legislation. The bill to which I referred a moment ago, which I introduced, would accomplish that purpose on a Nationwide scale.

Eighteen States today forbid discrimination in transportation and in recreation.

I do not pretend that this matter of discrimination is wholly a southern problem; it is not. In the last year there were four lynchings and eight race riots throughout the country. They were not all in the South; we had them in Chicago, in St. Louis, right here in the city of Washington, and in New York State; we had them in Baltimore, in Birmingham, and in Florida. So it is not a southern problem; it is a Nation-wide problem. The enactment of the FEPC law on a national scale will go a long way toward eliminating those very situations which bring about such riots and lynchings, it will be one further step in the accomplishment of true freedom, freedom in the democratic way.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCRIVNER] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THOSE TAXES COME FROM YOUR POCKET

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Speaker, Lenin is reported as having said, just before his death: "We shall force the United States to spend itself into destruction." If his spirit is keeping check, it must be gleefully gloating as it looks down on us and reads our daily Treasury balance. If Lenin did not say that, the cumulative effect of the Communist program very closely approaches its accomplishment.

Seemingly the only remedy our present leaders have for communism is the old "greenback poultice."

Each day we grow financially weaker as our national debt mounts, even in these days of prosperity. What will happen if we have a little depression, just a teeny one, no one can predict.

Just how bad is it?

Let us take the Treasury's own figures as shown by the daily statement of the United States Treasury for December 30, 1949. This statement reflects our financial condition for that day and compares it with that day in the previous year.

On December 30, 1949, the Treasury report shows that Uncle Sam had spent $3,299,798,921.52 more than had been received since July 1, 1949.

Our national debt as of January 1, 1950, was $257,160,110,000.09, an increase of $4,305,708,539.54 over January 1, 1949. Since the calendar year takes in parts of two fiscal years, a part of this deficit, $1,005,909,618.02 applies to the fiscal year 1949, for which the initial appropriations were made by the Eightieth Congress. But the Eighty-first Congress made deficiency and special appropriations of $2,152,868,802 to apply against fiscal 1949 without which there would have been a surplus for fiscal 1949 of $1,146,959,183.98.

From these figures it can be clearly seen that the first calendar year under the Eighty-first Congress put Uncle Sam in the red $5,500,000,000 to $6,000,000,000 more.

Incidentally, the more we owe the greater becomes our burden of interest which is now nearly $500,000,000 per month.

It should be remembered, too, that the much-maligned Eightieth Congress not only cut spending $3,500,000,000 under that proposed by the President but also reduced taxes $4,000,000,000 and still left a $7,000,000,000 surplus, most of which was paid on the Federal debt. This was the first balanced budget in 17 years and probably the last tax cut, of any substance, the country will get for a long time in the future.

As a member of the Appropriations Committee you would naturally expect me to talk about where we spend our money. However, since the subject of taxes is uppermost in everyone's mind—is close to your heart, at least to your pocketbook—let us take a look at where Uncle Sam gets his money.

Whether you realize it or not, the United States, through its taxes, lives with you every second of every minute of every day of your life. Studying these figures which I will point out to you—you will soon see, if you have not done so before—that there is nothing free from Uncle Sam. Uncle Sam has to pay for it all, and the only source of revenue that the Government of the United States has is taxes. If Uncle Sam spends more than he takes from us in taxes, the only thing left to do is issue more bonds. The more bonds that are issued against Uncle Sam as security, the less all those bonds are worth. That is just plain economics. Eventually the widows, the school children, the veterans, businessmen, banks, and insurance companies who hold these bonds, whether the investment is $25 or $25,000,000, must some day be repaid—repaid from current taxes.

Everything Uncle Sam buys on credit costs 25 percent more than if bought with cash. The bonds we issued in 1940 are due in 1950. Each $3 invested calls for $4 in repayment.

The Federal debt is a burden all of us must help carry and pay with accrued interest. At present, with 60,000,000 persons working, the pro rata debt burden is over $4,000 for each worker. If that were a hunk of silver, it would weigh 403 pounds. That weight of debt hanging around each worker's neck is enough to slow him down considerably.

With those remarks as background, let us look at a report made by the Treasury Department covering revenue from July 1, 1948, to June 30, 1949. The figures are big. They may become boring but they are important. They show what comes out of your pocket.

It is your money.

Everyone who earns, and this includes school children on vacation, has learned about income tax and has found that before he gets his hands on his pay check Uncle Sam's tax collector has been there ahead of him, taking out social security and income taxes. Personally, I would favor repeal of the withholding tax system, for it has made taxpaying too painless. The worker today hardly realizes how much tax he does pay. The worker would be conscious of his tax burden if he had to dig up the dough each 3 months, as many of you do. He would be brought face to face with the fact that he, the worker himself, not the boss, pays the tax.

Well, at any rate individual earners in the fiscal year of 1949—July 1, 1948, to June 30, 1949—kicked in a trifle over $18,000,000,000, nearly three billion less than in 1947, mostly withheld and paid in by the employers. The corporations paid in a little more than eleven and one-half billion on income—up one and one-fourth billion over 1947. These two items total $29,605,000,000. That was not enough to meet the $43,250,000,000 spending spree, so Uncle Sam had to dig deeper for tax dollars.

Corporations paid in another $2,500,000,000 for retirement insurance, including railroad and unemployment tax. These are special trust funds and, just as labor and material, they are part of the cost of production and as such are passed on to and indirectly paid by the worker who buys the bread, the shoes, the radio, and the car.

Now that it is legal in Kansas, we can discuss liquor, even mention highballs. One fact should not be lost sight of: Uncle Sam's tax collector is right there at your elbow when you are bending it.

From taxes on imported and domestic wine and whisky the tax collector comes in for $2,000,000,000. This is less than the amount collected in 1947.

One of the radio programs advertising cigarettes asks, "Does your cigarette taste different lately?" The wonder is, Mr. Speaker, no matter how good the meal may have been, that the after-dinner cigarette even tastes, because the greater portion, around 75 percent, of the cost of that cigarette is taxes. Puffing on taxes certainly cannot be anything but distasteful, especially when the cost is $1,232,734,672.22 annually.

Tobacco taxes on cigars, chewing tobacco, and other forms bring in $89,140,097.73. Though many people think chewing went out with handle-bar mustaches, tobacco chewers and smokers contribute $25,000,000 in taxes for spitting at and probably missing the spittoon.

An amazing disclosure in this report is that snuff chewers pinch off $7,272,000 in taxes. Most people did not realize there was that much snuff sold, let alone that much tax paid on the stuff.

Stamp taxes were a hot issue in 1776. They are still with us—stuck on bonds, mortgages, and playing cards, all told in the sum of $73,000,000. The bridge, canasta, and poker players, if any, pay a $7,500,000 levy on the cards they use.

However, businessmen are especially concerned about the tax burden on business; taxes which, if they could be reduced, would lower the cost of living, and by so doing make the workers' dollars buy more. After all, these taxes, too, are in the price, though concealed, of every item they affect, and all are affected in one way or another. Some necessities of life carry uncountable tax items; for instance, a loaf of bread has at least 150 items of tax in it.

Greases and lubricating oils, so essential to keeping the wheels of production and the wheels and motors of our cars turning smoothly, feel the grip—firm despite the elusive quality of oil—of the tax collector. Taxes on lubricating oils bring Uncle Sam $82,000,000.

Without gasoline a lot of us could not work, let alone take a vacation. We could not call on as many customers, we could not serve our clients, and we could not deliver our merchandise. There, too, we find the tax cash flowing into Uncle Sam's coffers. This time it is a real item, a big load on business, $503,000,000—a half billion dollars.

Our farm wagons and oxcarts rolled on steel rims, but fast-moving cars, busses, trucks, tractors, and trailers need rubber tires and tubes. Here again Uncle Sam gets his hand into our pocketbooks for taxes, $150,000,000 worth. That is not all; before we even get the cars and trucks on the highways the bite is on for more taxes on them, $498,000,000. Experts declare that nearly one-fourth of the price of a Ford—or any other car—is taxes. That is before you are hit with State sales and license taxes. You would think that after you begin to use these vehicles and they start wearing out Uncle Sam's tax men would get out and let you alone, but they do not. They snag you again for taxes on repair parts and accessories in the amount of $120,000,000.

Most of us take electricity for granted and as tax-free, but even the light I need at home to read this mass of figures to the taxpayers is taxed. Electrical energy produced in our plants brings more dollars into the tax bill, $79,000,000.

Our doctors tell us to use better light to save our eyes. We do and we pay more taxes on the very light bulbs that shed their gleam on the pages of our daily paper. As we depend more on electricity, gas, and oil, the appliances we use contribute more taxes, $80,000,000.

Radio has become a part of our life—whether it is Bing Crosby or Ezio Pinza or the Metropolitan Opera. Some families have two or three radios, not to mention the one in pop's car. In more recent days television has come into our taverns and our homes. Surely, you say, here is amusement that is free. You are wrong. The tax collector sits with us at our fireside to the tune of $49,000,000 more on these radio and television sets—$20,000,000 less than 1947.

Even Mule Train records are lugged. Records—musical, discordant, classical, or hillbilly—pay $6,500,000 to Uncle Sam.

Parents purchase pianos, drums, saxophones, clarinets, and trumpets for aspiring and embryo Sousas, Dorseys, Iturbis, and Krupas. The clatter, squeaks, squawks, and booms was sweet music to the Treasury, with $9,250,000 dropping in the coffers.

When the ice man went out the back door the tax man came in the front with the electric refrigerators. The demand for air conditioning in factories, offices, and homes grew by leaps and bounds, but whether it is hot or cold, cooling or freezing, the tax collector comes in for $77,000,000 more—$22,000,000 increase over 1947.

Zippo or Ronson and other lighters are found in many of our pockets and purses yet matches are not a thing of the past. Uncle Sam gets in on burnt fingers for $8,750,000—$2,000,000 less than 1947—on matches.

With sales taxes, social-security taxes, unemployment taxes—all sorts of deductions—the bookkeepers and the billing clerks in plants and offices have become machine operators. The more business machinery you have to have the happier the Collector of Internal Revenue becomes. On business and store machines he issues tax receipts for $43,000,000.

Most men like to see pictures—especially of beautiful women and children. Movies and still cameras record pleasurable moments on vacations or at conventions. News stories are more readable with photos. Professional and amateur photographers add to the pile of tax dollars by another $43,000,000 each year.

Fishermen, golfers, hunters, baseball, softball, and football players cannot escape Uncle Sam and his horde of tax hounds. All of these pay over $30,000,000 for their fun and exercise.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that somewhere we should escape these Treasury sleuths.

Possibly we can do it in our own home, in our bathroom—that is private, is it not? Well, each morning, except Thursday or Friday in New York, the tax-earner gets up and shaves, but he has company: The tax collector is leering into the mirror, thinking about the taxes on soap, face lotion, and powder. A man's wife cannot powder her nose, rouge her cheeks, perfect the cupid bow on her lips or polish her nails without that tax man invading her boudoir. The take here is $93,000,000. Uncle Sam gets in on our romances too. The young GI, heart pounding, can do no less than get "her" an engagement ring even if it has only a little teeny-weeny diamond. When he slips it on her finger, puts his arm around her, and kisses her, is he alone in his bliss? No, the tax man is there, too. And when he gets the plain gold band and says "I do" the tax man is right behind—if not ahead of—the preacher.

Jewelry glitters and glistens, and its purchasers pay over $200,000,000 to Uncle Sam. But how a $5 alarm clock ever got into the luxury class I will never know but Uncle Sam thinks it is. When it clatters at 5:30 in the morning that young husband will not think it is even a necessity.

A year or so later, about three in the morning the young husband, a father now, has to get up—well, all you fathers know what for. When he changes that "didy" and rubs some oil or pats some powder on the baby's—uh—bottom, the tax taker is right there participating in those pats. Toilet preparations for dad, mother, sister, and baby carry a tax load of nearly a hundred million dollars.

We are still way short of the billions the administration is spending at home and abroad. No matter how sweet home is, lots of us travel—to school, to Washington, to factories, on honeymoons. Of course, we could just tie our stuff in a bundle like our hobo friends do, but we do not; we get suitcases and all sorts of luggage. Uncle Sam just chuckles and taps us for another chunk in the amount of $80,632,323.81.

Then there is another little item: After mother has lived with us 30 years or so, she suggests that several of the girls have fur coats and she would like to have one, too. After putting up with us that long, she deserves one. Maybe you did not kick too much on 20 percent being added to your twenty-fifth-wedding-anniversary silver, but 20 percent on a fur coat burns you up and only 80 percent of the cost goes to keeping her warm. So whether it is muskrat, mink, or rabbit, husbands throughout the Nation drop $62,000,000 more into that yawning tax cavern. Even our sweet tooth is taxed. Sugar carries enough taxes to turn it sour—$76,000,000.

Talk about free speech all you please, but the use of long-distance telephone and telegraph adds $311,000,000 to the cost of doing business. When you are not home you call your wife or she calls you, your conversations are taxed to the last click of the receiver—224 more millions. So chatter, business or pleasure, is costly—over one-half billion.

Whether it is a trip to Niagara Falls, a sales convention, or an emergency due to illness or death in the family, Uncle Sam rides along and this tax adds another one-fourth billion to the expense of the trips.

We have a vast network of railroad lines and highways. Freight cars and transports carry everything from food to furniture, candy, fruit, vegetables, flour, coal and iron, all the products of mines, farms, forests, and factories from coast to coast, border to border. The more we buy, the more freight we move, the more that tax man adds to the bill. We pay taxes on transportation of property—$337,000,000 more or another one-third billion dollars. This torrent of taxes pyramids because transportation taxes are levied every time the commodity moves from the very first time the raw ore, food, or fiber leaves the mine or field.

Occasionally you try to forget your worries; forget how you will pay the bills, including taxes. You try to lose yourself and your problems in the world of make-believe. You and your wife decide to leave the children with a sitter and go to the movie. Who walks in and sits down in your seat with you? The tax collector, of course. Theatergoers help the harvest of taxes—paying tribute of more than one-third billion dollars—to be exact $385,843,793.10.

Cabarets and night clubs help a little—$3,000,000. Club members add $28,000,000 more. Bowling alleys and pool halls help things along but not much. Their share is only $3,800,000.

Outlawed though they may be in most places, there are enough slot machines of all kinds in operation that Uncle Sam, while he may not hit the jackpot, gets his much more surely. The whirling disks, the blinking lights, and the clanging bells run up twenty-one million in nickels, dimes, and quarters in Uncle Sam's coin-collecting machines.

The much-discussed oleo, pale or yellow, often called the poor man's butter, carries its load of taxes, too, $17,500,000 worth. Coconut oil adds another $17,500,000, and a few miscellaneous items add a little more.

Mr. Speaker, two things are certain: death and taxes. These figures show how Uncle Sam plagues and taxes us at every turn. You would think surely he would let us alone in death. But not so; there are a lot of tax items tied up in the funeral, so the tax collector goes with you to your grave. Estate taxes bring in $735,000,000—nearly $100,000,000 less than 1947 and constantly shrinking. Gift taxes, also shrinking, give Uncle Sam $60,757,000 more.

Taken altogether Uncle Sam has scraped our pocketbook for more than we spend for food. He took $40,463,125,018.61 in fiscal 1949. That is still $5,500,000,000 to $6,000,000,000 less than your servants, the Democrat administration and the Democrat-controlled Eighty-first Congress, are spending. Furthermore, the President's message calls for still increased spending.

This alarming state of affairs recalls the words of two former Democrat Presidents. One said:

> Any government, like any family, can for a year spend a little more than it earns. But you know that a continuance of that habit means the poorhouse.

How far we are from the poorhouse no one can say but we are altogether too close for comfort. How near we are to fulfilling Lenin's prediction, no one knows.

Mr. Speaker, the other Democrat President, Thomas Jefferson, spoke words which should be in every American taxpayer's home, they should be in the office of the President and every Member of Congress in letters a foot high:

> I place economy among the first and most important virtues, and public debt as the greatest of dangers to be feared. To preserve our independence, we must not let our rulers load us with perpetual debt. We must make our choice between economy and liberty or profusion and servitude.
> If we run into such debts, we must be taxed in our meat and drink, in our necessities and our comforts, in our labors and in our amusements. If we can prevent the Government from wasting the labors of the people, under the pretense of caring for them, they will be happy.

Mr. Speaker, how truly he spoke. Every worker is taxed on his necessities and comforts, his meat and drink, his labors and his amusements. His labors are wasted by the Government and the Government does pretend to care for them.

Mr. Speaker, every worker, every housewife, every employer, especially every young person, should realize that those are his dollars that Uncle Sam is spending.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MULTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. MULTER asked and was given permission to address the House on Tuesday next for 10 minutes, following the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk and the conclusion of special orders heretofore granted.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PRICE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ENGLE of California). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] is recognized for 10 minutes.

ONE-YEAR RENEWAL OF FEDERAL RENT CONTROL URGED

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the people of the country are entitled to know now while many State legislatures are in session the intentions of Congress with respect to the extension of Federal rent control. It will be a serious mistake and not in the best interests of the country if this decision is permitted to wait until close to June 30, 1950, and is then not made at all, or made at the eleventh hour. Such action will play directly into the hands of those misguided people who believe that a runaway rental structure is beneficial to property owners—for should this happen the retribution would be far more severe than rent control today.

As it is today, though Federal rent control has, due to the fair net operating income adjustment provisions, resulted in some enormous rent increases of between 30 and 50 percent, it has on the whole thus far—and I emphasize thus far—tolerably held the rent control line, and the fair net operating income provision can and should be eliminated in a renewal of the act. Certainly removal of Federal rent control is no answer to the problem. For example, in New York City with 1,800,000 family housing units under control, rent increases under the 1949 act averaged 11.4 percent and applied to 7 percent of the controlled units. Most of the cases in which increases were granted—100,740 out of 123,491 units, the total affected by increases—were stated by OHE to be due to major capital improvements, increased services, and increased occupancy. In the rent clinic which I conduct in my own district where the cases of about 6,000 tenants have been serviced, our experience has been that about 5 percent of the tenants whom we have represented have received rent increases and the amount of increase has not exceeded 11 percent. The amendment to the Federal rent control which I had the privilege of proposing, and which requires the landlord who wishes to qualify for a rent increase to certify to maintenance of tenants' services equal to those existing on the rent-freeze date, has been a vital factor in holding the balance of equal justice between landlord and tenant. In New York City OHE reports that tenants in 30 percent of the cases successfully opposed efforts to get rent increases where the required services were not being rendered by the landlord, and in that city OHE reports that 85,271 reduction-of-services cases were handled in 1949 with restoration of service or compensating rent reductions in 83.8 percent or 71,452 of the cases.

We must not overlook that fact that some extremist elements, sometimes unwittingly aided and abetted by some short-sighted politicians, have been using the rent-control issue to stir up public confusion and what is even worse, discord and lack of confidence by thousands of tenants in government. It is difficult for Members who are not from big cities to understand the amount of mischief which can be done in this way and the real subversion of public confidence which can be practiced through some ostensibly claiming to be protecting tenants' rights. The abandonment of Federal rent control at this time would strengthen the hands of such harmful elements in the community, for rent is of the most critical importance to the normal big-city family, costing as it does 15 to 25 percent of their total income, and a runaway rent structure is, therefore, a fertile breeding ground for demagoguery and the creation of bitter class antagonisms.

The evidence bearing on the question of continued Federal rent control demands its extension. The reason for applying Federal rent control in the first instance was that the housing shortage was countrywide and that rent gouging on a national scale could ensue as rent controls were loosened. Certainly the brief experience with runaway rents during the short time when controls were off just after the war demonstrated the incipient national danger in this condition.

The criteria which should determine whether Federal rent control should be reenacted or should terminate on June 30 next are, first, has the housing shortage been materially overcome; second, what has been the experience with decontrol where it has been tried; and, third, is the Federal rent-control law adequate for the public interest?

Country-wide surveys indicate that the housing shortage continues. Since 1945 the annual rate of housing construction has not exceeded roughly a million units per year. We have fallen far short of this mark. It should be noted that our population increased in 1949 alone about 3,000,000 and that in that year there entered into the market for housing about 700,000 families. It is significant that the Joint Committee on Housing in their final report, March 1948 (pp. 8–11) estimated that 1,287,000 to 1,441,000 housing units must be started each year to satisfy housing requirements by 1960. When the housing shortage was first recognized as a housing emergency, estimates of the emergency housing need ranged between 3 and 5 million new units, with a great proportion needed as rental units. The rate of construction since 1945 up to December 31, 1949, has resulted in 3,471,000 housing starts, an average of 868,000 per year, and of these only about 20 percent were for rental—the high being 23 percent in 1949—against a normal 40 percent constructed for rental before World War II. The recorded housing starts include, too, considerable replacement housing and higher income bracket housing; also the addition of over 2,000,000 new families since 1945 has greatly increased the demand. Altogether I estimate that housing construction to date has resulted in an actual contribution to reducing the housing emergency by no more than one-third.

In New York City, for example, 250,000 housing units were urgently needed early in 1946 to look after families doubled up or tripled up, most all of them veterans, or compelled to live in substandard accommodations. Yet under the whole construction program in New York City since 1945 about 80,000 of these units have been supplied. Evidence of the great need is also shown in New York City by the fact that applications for public housing units are often 10 times the number of units available.

One of the primary contributions to the emergency need is the inability to supply housing under existing costs and even with existing Federal aids, at rentals of less than $80 per month for the normal unit. This is between $20 to $30 per month beyond the reach of the normal family. Even the public housing program authorized by the last Congress expected to contribute 810,000 public housing units is designed for construction over a 6-year period and such units have not been supplied or will not be for about another year.

Of the approximately 14,500,000 units under control, April 1, 1949, OHE reports that 2,621,900 had been decontrolled by December 16, 1949.

OHE reports that between April 1 and December 16, 1949, a total of 642 decontrol actions were taken which removed controls from an estimated 2,621,900 rental units; the Housing Expediter took 438 of these actions on his own initiative, thus decontrolling 1,035,600 rental units in about 200 towns and cities; local option accounted for 193 actions affecting 674,800 rental units, and 6 actions affecting 837,500 rental units were taken by State option; and 5 actions affecting 74,000 units were taken on the recommendation of local rent advisory boards.

Experience with decontrol indicates sharp rent rises in most areas in which decontrol has taken place—averaging between $6.76 to $14.09 per month in apartments in the $30–$50 monthly rental brackets and covering 50 percent of all apartments in such rental brackets in key cities. Even assuming that areas decontrolled had a right to expect material rent increases in connection with the decision to decontrol it is yet extremely significant that increases were heavy and widespread.

Though the decontrol machinery under the Federal law permits decontrol on a State-wide and even on a local basis, decontrol has been relatively limited both in the number of units and the areas affected. Only six States—Nebraska, Texas, Arizona, Utah, Alabama, and Wisconsin—have decontrolled and there are not included the most populous States of New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and California. For example, no big city in the Northeast has decontrolled, and even in the South where the decontrol movement has gained headway there is strong opposition to decontrol in a central point like Atlanta, Ga. OHE reports that 75 cities with over 100,000 population remain under Federal rent control.

The theory of congressional reenactment of the Federal rent-control law is being sustained. The housing emergency continues to exist on a broad scale throughout the country and therefore a national law is essential. The machinery for decontrol is beginning to function by States and localities so that the problem may at the proper time safely be liquidated into local controls or decontrols as the original rent-control program was designed to operate. But at this time an extension of Federal rent control to June 30, 1951, is essential. Certain changes in the law are, however, required in connection with its reenactment for a year, to eliminate the fair net operating income provision of the law and reestablish the hardship test for landlords to qualify for rent increases contained in the 1946 Federal rent-control law which worked with much greater fairness.

I am appending to these remarks a country-wide survey published by the New York Times on Sunday, January 1, showing how limited has been the decontrol movement and the drastic upswing in rents where decontrol has taken place:

UPSWING IN RENTS IS FOUND WHERE CONTROLS ARE ENDED

(By Lee E. Cooper)

A general upswing in the level of residential rents in decontrolled areas throughout the country was indicated yesterday in a survey made by the New York Times. With Federal controls lifted from more than 2,600,000 family rental units during the past 9 months, it was apparent from reports received from all regions that the prices being paid for shelter had broken out of the narrow range in which they had been held by law for about 6 years.

Although about 12,000,000 families, including those in New York City, and nearly all other major population centers, still are under rent-ceiling protection, many of these families have been affected recently by the growing number of approvals by rent authorities of landlord petitions for increases.

From April 1, 1949, the date the present Federal legislation became effective to December 9 the Office of the Housing Expediter in Washington reported that 631 decontrol actions had been completed, taking 2,587,000 family rental units from its control. In the past 3 weeks several communities have been added to the list.

STATES WITHOUT CONTROLS

Four States, Nebraska, Texas, Arizona, and Utah, are now without controls and Alabama has voted to end controls in May. Wisconsin is under a State law which replaced the Federal statute and has permitted substantial rises in rents.

Details on the present situation in the housing market as reported by New York Times correspondents in key cities and obtained from other sources were in most instances at variance with the assertions of realty interests that the lifting of the ceilings had caused no appreciable changes in rental conditions. Unprecedented building activity in some centers, however, has helped to ease the problem of transition.

The general level of rents in Houston was found to have risen 11 percent in 3 months and nearly as much in Milwaukee. Substantial increases were reported in Omaha and Lincoln in Nebraska. Rises put into effect in Spokane, Wash., were said to average 14.3 percent.

There was evidence of isolated increases of 100 percent or more in some cities now operating under a free market. In communities such as Tampa and Miami families occupying the cheaper apartments were found to have been hit hardest, while tenants of some of the more expensive apartments had slightly lower monthly charges.

THE NORTHEAST

In New York State and the New England region all major population centers still are under the Federal ceilings extending to June 30, 1950, and fairly stable conditions are noted despite occasional protests against approval of rent rises based on the hardship clause or other sections of the law. No large city has been decontrolled. Actions seeking decontrol have thus far affected only a few sparsely populated communities.

Thus far the Metropolitan Fair Rent Committee, representing property owners here, has failed in its efforts to get a blanket increase of 15 percent. Last week it suggested an increase of 25 percent under the revived rule requiring repainting of apartments every 2 years.

In Boston, although exact figures were not available, a large percentage of rent-increase petitions was being granted under the fair net operating income provision of the law, according to Edgar Driscoll, area rent-control director for New England. This was in line with a general policy reflecting increased costs of operation, Mr. Driscoll said.

In the five-county Philadelphia area containing 420,000 registered units under the jurisdiction of the Housing Expediter, the borough of Swarthmore voted for local option in October, but otherwise there has been no movement for the removal of rent controls.

A spokesman for the Philadelphia real estate board reported that his organization always would be moving in the direction of decontrol and also would like to see some provision allowing for the increasing cost of operation and maintenance.

The Philadelphia area rent office processed 749 petitions from landlords in November and approved 490. The approvals grant rent increases on 1,725 units with an average rise of $10.45 monthly. In the first 11 months of 1949 increases approved on 7,389 rental units increased aggregate monthly payments by the tenants from $348,445 to $421,593.

THE SOUTH

In the South attention has been centered on Florida, where Miami, Tampa, and Jacksonville were freed of ceilings recently after Gov. Fuller Warren had vetoed a bill which would have removed controls on a State-wide basis except for areas around military installations.

In Miami a typical small apartment or house which brought $50 monthly now is renting for about $65, but those which had been leased at $200 can be had for about $150.

With more than 100,000 new family units built in Miami in the past 3 years and many seasonal units offered on an all-year basis following decontrol, the supply now exceeds the demand in some types of housing and there are quite a few vacancies. The net effect is to force down the rent for higher-priced living space.

Higher-priced all-year apartments in Tampa which had been bringing $90 to $120 a month have been reduced by about 10 percent. In the medium-price bracket, from $50 to $90, there have been rent increases of about the same percentage. In the cheaper housing, notably housing for Negroes, there have been instances of rent increases of more than 100 percent, with rents formerly at $4 a week going to as much as $10. Owners of this type of housing assert that they went for years without any return on their investment while rents were frozen.

A high level of house building in Tampa has helped to keep rentals down. Motor court building on the outskirts also has been very active recently, with the result that a price war has developed in some areas. This has forced down the daily cost of a "kitchenette" unit in some courts to about $1.25 per person from $3.50 to $7.

"Not much change" in Tampa

Officials of the Tampa Board of Realtors, on the basis of a recent survey, reported "not much change" in the general level of rents.

By action of the Alabama Legislature, rent ceilings will end in the State May 25. Rent-control officials in Montgomery predicted that the result probably would be a number of upward rent adjustments ranging to 50 percent.

An increase in the number of rental units was reported in Knoxville, Chattanooga and some smaller communities in Tennessee, but spot surveys indicated an over-all rise of 6 to 8 percent in monthly rentals. One leading realtor in Chattanooga estimated the rent rise in that city at 12 to 15 percent. There has been a marked increase in the amount of repair work on rental properties recently. High-priced units have been offered at lower prices.

Landlords and tenants in Atlanta are bracing for a fight over decontrol this month when a new city council takes office. The prospects seem to favor the tenants. Mayor William B. Hartsfield has been opposing all attempts to lift ceilings in the city.

Atlanta has had a continued shortage of low-rent units. There has been no let-up in the demand for housing at $60 a month or less, but the situation has eased for houses and apartments at $80 or more, with slight declines noted last month in the rents on new higher-priced suites. The level of rents in the city rose about 4 percent in the year ended November 15.

Columbus, Ga., moved into the rent decontrol bracket last week when Gov. Herman Talmadge approved action of that city's rent commission. Savannah has taken similar action to go into effect early this year. Decontrol also has been voted in Charlotte and Asheville, N. C., and Columbia, S. C.

Local action to lift ceilings in Savannah and Charlotte, however, received at least a temporary set-back by an adverse ruling just made by Ed Dupree, Acting Housing Expediter, because deferred dates were fixed for decontrol in those cities. The resolution adopted by the governing body of Savannah had set February 1 as the decontrol date, and Charlotte had specified May 1.

Mr. Dupree said the Housing and Rent Act of 1949 failed to make any provision for decontrol by local option at a specified future date, but contemplated only immediate actions.

It is expected that amended resolutions omitting the dates will be approved in the two cities.

THE MIDDLE WEST

A considerable number of decontrol actions taken on the initiative of the Office of Housing Expediter and increasing numbers of rent rises granted on petitions of landlords characterized the past year in the nine-State area administered as region VI.

Region VI comprises Colorado, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wyoming, and covers about 2,500,000 rental dwelling units. Nebraska and Wisconsin were in region VI, but Nebraska dropped controls by legislative action over the veto of Gov. Val Peterson, and Wisconsin substituted a State law last September.

The decontrol actions in region VI indicated an improvement in the rental situation in smaller communities, but conditions still are tight in the metropolitan districts, particularly with respect to medium rentals available to families with incomes of $50 a week or slightly higher, where the bulk of the demand is concentrated.

Rents were officially increased in the region for various reasons on 25,000 apartments during October, the rises ranging from $6.94 to $8.83 a month. The final figures are expected to show 35,000 or more December increases. The Chicago Fair Rent Committee has an action pending in the emergency court of appeals for a blanket increase.

Farm areas not affected

Conditions were found to be fairly quiet in the agricultural areas of the Midwest, which never felt the full force of the housing shortage. Few instances of use of the local option clause in the Federal statute have come up. In Ohio, ceilings still are in effect in Cleveland, Cincinnati, and Dayton.

In Des Moines, the city council recently rejected a decontrol resolution. In St. Louis a movement has been started to put a decontrol resolution before the city council. In Laramie, Wyo., such a petition recently was withdrawn.

Wichita, Kans., and Blytheville, Ark., were freed of ceilings last week, but the full effect has not yet been apparent in either place.

Continued "unprecedented" apartment building has eased the housing situation in most Indiana communities and there have been no general complaints of rent increases. Some Federal officials, however, insist that the situation demands more Government-sponsored projects.

Bloomington, Ind., took local decontrol action but formal ratification in Washington was held up because the Bloomington petition had set a deferred date, April 1.

Wisconsin law debated

Controversy has arisen over the merits of the Wisconsin law which replaced Federal ceilings. The State statute authorized rent increases of 15 percent for all tenants who had agreed to a 15-percent voluntary rise previously under the Federal regulations and permitted increases of 30 percent for families which had not signed such agreements.

Most landlords requested and received the authorized increases. Some held the line voluntarily, however, and others decided to charge less than the maximum permitted under the law. The State CIO challenged the constitutionality of the State law, but lost the case in the Federal district court.

Conflicting reports were heard in Topeka, Kans., following decontrol. Officials of a property owners' group which sponsored the decontrol movement insisted that increases had been slight, but a labor-union representative declared that in some instances rents had doubled. One instance was cited of a monthly rate increased to $75 from $40.

A disturbed situation was noted in Nebraska, where decontrol was completed on November 2 with the lifting of ceilings in Omaha and Lincoln. Mayor Glenn Cunningham, of Omaha said tenants' complaints recently had declined to a trickle and court records there showed a slight drop in evictions.

The fair-rent committee set up by the Omaha real estate board asserted that these factors indicated a surprisingly easy adjustment to decontrol, but Mayor Cunningham and spokesmen for labor countered that they merely indicated that there is nothing the people can do about it.

"I think that maybe in the spring the situation will begin to adjust itself, but certainly November was too early for decontrol," Mayor Cunningham commented.

He guessed that rent increases had averaged 45 percent.

Al Witzling, president of the Omaha Central Labor Union, said that the increases would average 50 percent. He declared that one reason for the dearth of complaints is the fear of eviction.

Dr. Wesley Jones, who represents the Urban League on the Omaha fair-rent committee, stated that the rent situation as a whole was fair, with increases averaging 30 percent. Peter Marchetti, lawyer representing the small property owners association, reported many large houses made available for rent after having been held off the market while controls existed. Jack Evahn, representing the Omaha building owners and managers association, estimated the average rent increases at 20 percent.

In Lincoln Joseph T. Wishart, lawyer and chairman of the Nebraska small property owners committee, estimated the average rise at 18 percent.

THE WEST COAST

On the west coast conditions generally were reported stabilized, with controls continuing virtually intact.

A considerable number of higher rents was noted in Spokane, Wash., after 5 months of decontrol. James P. Dillard, chairman of the Spokane rent advisory board, which recommended the decontrol, noted in a report last month to Housing Expediter Tighe Woods that the average increase was 14.3 percent, or about $5.25 monthly. He added that a few rental housing operators had taken advantage of the situation to put unreasonable increases into effect.

He stated that there had been a large increase in the number of properties offered for rent recently, and estimated the number of Spokane vacant units at 1,200 to 1,500. One reason is the heavy postwar construction of fairly low-priced houses.

On the other side of the picture, Fred Simmons, who managed the Spokane area rent office before decontrol closed it, announced that he had received complaints from 100 tenants that their rent had been increased 38 to 53 percent.

In the Los Angeles district rents were reported still "extremely tight." Decontrol was authorized on December 7 in Beverly Hills and Ben C. Koepke, area rent director, said that complaints by Beverly Hills tenants of rent increases of as much as 275 percent and averaging nearly 80 percent had reached his office. Bitter controversy preceded decontrol in Beverly Hills, west-end neighborhood of Los Angeles.

Complaints also were received from Pasadena, Alhambra, Elmonte and Pomona. The average increase cited in the complaints, according to Mr. Koepke, was slightly more than $52, indicating that some owners were attempting "rent gouges" and that others were taking this method of trying to get rid of unwanted tenants.

General Los Angeles picture

Many modern apartments are available in the Los Angeles district at $75 or more a month, unfurnished, but hundreds of families are looking in vain for places at $35 to $70 and new arrivals are complicating the situation.

A growing sentiment for decontrol was noted in Long Beach and some other populous communities near Los Angeles, where the housing situation has improved lately.

Controlled rental units in the San Francisco area show an average rate of $44.42 a month, compared with an average of $82.50 for suites in new houses not under control, according to the Federal rent office there. Rent adjustments were granted in the years to landlords of more than 7,000 units, with an average increase of $8.25 a month. The total annual income of landlords was increased by about $695,000. All of the populous centers near San Francisco still are under the rent regulations.

THE SOUTHWEST

In the Southwest interest has been centered on the results of decontrol in the large cities of Texas. The Federal Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that the index of rents in Houston rose 11 percent in the 3 months which ended November 15. There was said to be a comparable situation in Dallas, Fort Worth, and San Antonio, all of which have been free of ceiling since September 1.

Rents for some houses in the four cities have been increased 10 to 15 percent, with isolated increases of perhaps as much as 100 percent, according to the Houston Property Owners Association. The association asserted, however, that these increases had been largely offset by lower rents for many apartments.

There have been recurrent warnings lately that Houston may be overbuilding so far as multifamily housing is concerned. A renter's market appears to be returning. There also has been a broad expansion in construction of houses. A further competitive factor has been the return of many houses to the rental market following decontrol.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If I understand the gentleman correctly, under the legislation that he is proposing the landlord would have to give the figures justifying his request for an increase?

Mr. JAVITS. He does now—he gives the figures now, sir. What I was referring to just now was a provision in the law which says that in order to qualify for an increase the landlord must certify, and there are penalties for false certification, that he is giving and will continue to give the same services to the tenant which the tenant enjoyed on the rent-freeze date, whatever that is in the particular rent-control area.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If we are to have rent control, I can see the justice of that, but does the gentleman advocate any provision being inserted in the law whereby the tenant would be required to show whether his income has increased, so that he might be able to pay more rent?

Mr. JAVITS. I think the very fundamentals of a private economy, which the gentleman from Michigan speaks of so often on this floor, would be exactly contrary to an effort to require that rents other than for public housing should be established on requiring the tenant to show how much he could pay.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. This is what I am getting at: Assuming, just for the sake of the argument, that the rents are excessive, do you see any reason why the landlords, being selected out as a class, should be required to furnish the tenant a part of his rent charge? Why should it not be furnished by the public generally by giving the tenant a subsidy? Why in effect make the landlord pay a part of the rent?

Mr. JAVITS. We certainly made enough provisions in the law. I think we have much too liberal provisions in this law to see that landlords get a fair rental for their property. That is, if they endure a hardship, we have even gone to the extent, which I think is too far, of saying if they operate at a loss within a certain figure of net operating income their rents will be increased. Certainly, I think much more than a reasonable balance in favor of the landlord is being struck between the national housing emergency and private ownership of rental housing. The Government has taken a hand in the situation due to the emergency. But it has not taken a hand, and I do not think anyone would be able to sustain that position, to the point where it has compelled the landlord to subsidize the tenant in order to meet this particular situation.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Oh, that is just the trouble. I have cases in my district where landlords are not getting enough rent, and the rent boards will not give them enough to pay for repairs, insurance, and running expenses.

Mr. JAVITS. What we are dealing with is the fundamental statute. We cannot in Congress try every case in order to determine whether the courts, boards, and machinery which we have set up are fairly applying the statute. I think our experience shows that, taking the country over, the statute is being fairly applied to landlords. Tenants complain bitterly that it is being much too fairly applied. If in the gentleman's district there is some administrative difficulty, I am sure the gentleman will seek ways and means, either through his own influence and prestige in this House, or otherwise, to show how that particular problem can be met. I am talking about the entire law as it stands.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I understand that, but I have been trying to get a little justice for a landlord here and there. But the law, speaking generally, seeks to regulate the rental income of the landlord, does it not?

Mr. JAVITS. No. I would not say that. The law limits, to the standard which is established by the statute, the extent to which the landlord may increase his rent.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Well, why do you not look at the financial income of the tenant and see what he can afford to pay, while you are looking at the landlord's income?

Mr. JAVITS. The gentleman shows a strange inconsistency. I am sure if we brought any such proposition to the floor of the House, that incomes shall be shown to determine what the rental shall be, the gentleman would see the end of our society in it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The Congress has determined, in determining what the landlord's income from his property shall be; that is why I think your rent control measures are going to be the end of our free-enterprise society.

Mr. JAVITS. I do not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. MULTER. I do not quite gather the point the gentleman is trying to make; possibly I have not listened to the gentleman long enough. President Truman in his state of the Union message recommended that the Congress extend rent control. The Banking and Currency Committees of the Senate and the House have announced that they are going to conduct hearings with a view to extending rent control. This, of course, does not mean that the entire House will go along with it if it is finally recommended. I believe that the House Committee on Banking and Currency will recommend the extension of rent control because it is necessary. I do not quite gather the point the gentleman is trying to make. I think every man, no matter what his politics may be, who comes from any metropolitan community, any large municipality, must stand for an extension of rent control at this time.

Mr. JAVITS. If the gentleman will permit me—the point I am making is that Congress should act on this question not on June 15, 1950, but should act on this question now, within the next 30 days while State legislatures are in session. If Congress does not renew rent control promptly we could easily have a repetition of the situation which occurred just after the war when there was complete chaos, very damaging to the country's economy. If Congress does not renew rent control, and I am stating why I believe that failure to extend Federal rent control would be a great mistake, the State legislatures, many of which are in session the first few months of the year, would have an opportunity to correct the situation in their own States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not doubt the need for controls in certain areas of the country, but as I see it the question in regard to the question of Federal rent control is whether or not the control of rents should be left to the local authorities.

Mr. JAVITS. If the gentleman will bear with me for 1 minute I will cover that point.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here is the question I wish to ask the gentleman: In the case of New York City which, of course, I assume needs rent control, is there not State machinery and municipal machinery already set up for the control of rents? And, if so, why the need for Federal rent control?

Mr. JAVITS. We have State machinery which is stand-by; that is, if the Federal Government control goes off, the State steps in. Our city machinery right now is in complete turmoil because of the constitutional questions involved.

My point is that the country needs rent control, and the two most salient elements of proof are first, that all the dwelling units we have built so far have not reduced the urgent need for housing. What causes doubling and tripling of occupancy? The fact that the houses we have built in the 3 years of operation have not reduced the emergency need. Secondly, despite the provision for decontrol that is in the law now in effect, relatively few States and municipalities have taken advantage of it. The problem is still an urgent country-wide problem. Finally, an unbiased survey, like the one made by the New York Times on January 1, 1950—which I am putting in the RECORD—demonstrates that in those cases where decontrol has taken place, rents for the people of moderate income, have shot inordinately upward.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five additional minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not like to, but I wish to know if we are going to continue this year the practice of last, of extending time and extending time on these special orders? It interferes with others who have subsequent special orders. It happened the other day, and time went on for almost half an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there are other special orders pending.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I will not press the objection, but I merely call the matter to the attention of the House.

Mr. JAVITS. One minute will suffice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York that he may proceed for one additional minute?

There was no objection.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. YATES. I may state to my friend from Michigan that the reason I asked that the gentleman's time be extended was because of his graciousness in yielding to so many who wished to interrogate him.

I may state to the gentleman from New York that in Illinois the legislature is not in session at this time and will not convene again until next year in the absence of a special session; and there will be no need for a special session unless an emergency arises. I should like to point out to the gentleman that the city of Chicago set up its own rent-control act, but that act was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois. So that for the State of Illinois on the basis of decisions as they presently exist, we cannot get a State-wide rent-control act. Therefore, for the State of Illinois, and particularly for the city of Chicago, a need exists for Federal rent control.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, may I make this one final point and then conclude. Under the pattern by which rent-control legislation has been brought up in the House before it has always been at the eleventh hour. This has created a very grave difficulty and constitutes, in my opinion, the nub of the problem. My point today is that we take it up immediately, early in this session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include certain statements and excerpts.

Mr. BRYSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include a letter he received regarding the coal strike and his answer thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BRYSON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

INDUSTRY'S SOUTHWARD MIGRATION

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, for generations the South has been considered a region whose economy depends largely upon her agricultural products. Agriculture is an ancient and honorable occupation, but its opportunities for expansion are minor as compared with those of business and manufacturing industries. Consequently, many regions throughout the entire world are attempting to increase their manufacturing facilities in an effort to improve business conditions and enhance prosperity.

During the past decade, no section within the United States has made greater strides than the South in expanding manufacturing industries. In tobacco products, the lumber industry, the manufacture of chemicals and the production of paper and pulp the South has made great progress. It is the textile industry, however, which has done more than any other manufacturing industry to change the South into an industrial region. This is especially true in the Southeastern States. In South Carolina, the value added by manufacturing rose 369.3 percent from 1930 to 1947. This increase exceeds that of all but one other State in the Nation.

In South Carolina since January of 1945, 803 industrial plants costing more than $270,000,000 have been completed. In addition, 1,066 existing plants have expanded or have planned expansion costing in excess of $200,000,000. This industrial activity has created 58,000 new jobs and has been reflected in business and financial figures. Bank deposits are up 322 percent; the business population has increased 40 percent; per capita income has increased 208 percent; private and commercial automobile registrations have increased in number from 268,000 to 408,000; and salaries and wages paid employees engaged in manufacturing activities have increased from $103,000,000 to $377,000,000. These comparisons are with the year 1939. Sales of insurance, the number of telephones in use, and the increases in retail sales also reflect the general prosperity of our State. All of this business activity cannot be attributed to the expansion of the manufacturing industries, but manufacturing has played a more important role than any other single factor.

In view of this fact, it is necessary to examine the factors which have changed the South, for many years purely by agricultural section, into an important manufacturing and industrial region.

From an industrial aspect the South is blessed with certain natural advantages. These may be classified as geographic, political, and social.

The South's geographic advantages are so many and varied. Its proximity to natural resources is one such advantage. Industrial water sources are unequalled. Long summers and mild winters keep fuel costs at a minimum.

Perhaps the South's greatest geograhic advantage is its ability to grow cotton, the world's greatest textile fiber. More cotton is used than all other textile fibers combined, and textile manufacturers have begun to take advantage of the cheaper transportation costs, which production near the source of the raw material allows. The textile industry has reached such great proportions in the South that 63.1 percent of the Nation's spinning activity is located within a 200-mile radius of my home. The Southeastern States have become the most important area in the United States for textile manufacturing. The influence of King Cotton in the South's industrial expansion cannot be overestimated.

The political advantage of the South is intangible, but it cannot be disregarded. Realizing that new industry must be attracted if the economy is to be expanded, the South's legislative policies have consistently been favorable toward industry. Governmental restrictions are kept at a minimum, and taxes are comparatively low. This policy of fair treatment and a minimum of interference has become a southern characteristic, and industry has responded by greatly expanding its activities.

The social factor is even more intangible than the political, but it is perhaps more important as a basic reason for attracting industry. The social factor is concerned with the people and their attitudes, habits, and mode of living. These people are native born Americans who equal any people in the world in skill, intelligence, and general ability. Many have come from farms and small cities where a 10- or 12-hour day is not unusual. An 8-hour day in a factory seems quite reasonable to them, and their willingness to follow the schedule of work is reflected in the low record of turn-over and absenteeism. Furthermore, they realize that they are well off and are naturally suspicious of agitators and trouble makers. An official of the Textron Manufacturing Co. has said that workers in plants located in the Carolinas outdo New England workers by 10 percent. The notion, long cherished in the North, that southern workers are lazy and shiftless is a myth, pure and simple. Industry has learned that the labor force in the South is cooperative, able, and intelligent. This abundant labor supply has become an important incentive to manufacturers who are seeking satisfactory locations. The charge that the southern labor force is paid starvation wages will not bear scrutiny. Figures belie this accusation, and manufacturers agree that it is efficiency, not cheapness, which is attracting industry South.

All of these factors have combined to give the South low-cost production and to attract industry. The South has also learned during the past decade that it pays to advertise. With all of the advantages which any section possesses, it can expect no results unless those advantages are known. South Carolina offers an example of a State which has learned to make known its attractions.

In 1945 an act was passed by the South Carolina General Assembly providing for the establishment of a research, planning, and development board. Nine objectives were listed which may be summed up in the last listed objective, which is to advance the general welfare of the State and the people. One specific objective as listed in the law is "to promote and encourage industrial development, private business and commercial enterprise, agricultural production, transportation, the utilization and investment of capital within the State."

The research, planning, and development board, operating under authority of this act, has been an essential factor in South Carolina's recent industrial expansion. The board inaugurated an advertising program and carried it out in national magazines and newspapers. This advertising and publicity was for the purpose of attracting new industry. Thousands of inquiries were received, and numerous manufacturing concerns opened plants after learning of the facilities and advantages. When an inquiry was received the board furnished data on the labor supply, power, transportation, sites, buildings, and the other necessary information to meet the requirements of a prospective manufacturer. The board has been careful to consult industries already established and to take no action which would be harmful to them. In some cases prospective industries which appeared undesirable have been discouraged from locating in the State. Industrial expansion is desired, but not at the expense of those industries already established.

Besides the advertisements, the board has issued a series of valuable bulletins giving the physical characteristics and various statistics for South Carolina. Those publications have proved invaluable to prospective manufacturers who are considering locating in the State. The board has pointed out that in South Carolina taxes are 10 percent cheaper than in any other section of the country; that power is 30 percent cheaper; fuel and heating 15 percent cheaper; and plant sites cheap and sometimes free. Together with the reasonable cost of labor, cheap construction costs, and cheap water, these factors offer a strong inducement for industry to locate within our State.

Proximity to good markets is important if an industry is to prosper, and South Carolina has not hesitated to point out that markets in the South, and especially the Southeast, have grown rapidly in recent years and are at present growing more rapidly than in any other section of the country.

It is no accident, then, that industry has commenced a steady migration southward. All businessmen admit that they seek a location where costs are lowest and profits are highest. The cotton textile industry was the first to demonstrate that conditions in the South are suitable for profitable manufacturing activities. Now other textile industries are beginning to follow suit, and within the next decade, we may see the synthetic fiber and woolen industries locating in hospitable southern climates. Since the close of the war, several woolen and worsted plants have opened in the South, and the August 18, 1949, edition of the American Wool and Cotton Reporter suggested that the woolen industry is likely to follow the cotton textile industry South. Granted that transportation costs will increase for a time, the high caliber of labor and the favorable geographical conditions will offset this and eventually lead to lower production costs than is possible in other locations.

In spite of the South's favorable location and her wealth of natural resources, it is her people who are responsible for bringing about the great industrial migration and expansion now in progress. Local capital has cooperated with industry in every respect, bringing about increased expansion and prosperity.

Labor has done even more to gain the respect of industry and to attract still more manufacturers. Whenever a new plant has been erected, applications for jobs have flooded the owner. The qualifications of the applicants are high, and their expectations of wages reasonable. Once on the job, they have demonstrated a willingness to work, to cooperate, and to follow instructions. Although cooperative with their employers, they are independent in spirit and are exceedingly wary of being organized or regimented in any way by professional organizers. In the State of South Carolina, 99.7 percent of the population is native-born, many of whom can trace their ancestry back to people who were in this country more than a century ago and in numerous cases to people who were here before the Revolutionary period. This background has instilled in the present generation a loyalty and a devotion to duty which is seldom found anywhere in the world. We are indeed a homogeneous people.

New industries in the South have led that region to a postwar growth and to a prosperity which would have been considered impossible two decades ago. Industry realizes that it has found a friend in the South. State governments have gone to considerable pains to keep industry prosperous and happy, and in turn industry has brought with it prosperity and higher living standards for all. This mutual cooperation between the people of the South and new manufacturing industries is serving both groups. The people understand that their greatest opportunity for prosperity and happiness lies in expanding industry, and they have made industry welcome. With a favorable climate, natural resources, an abundant supply of skilled labor, and generous treatment by legislative bodies, industries have found that great opportunities lie below the Mason and Dixon's line. Chemical plants, garment manufacturers, and ceramic industries are following the textile companies' lead and are discovering the advantages which the South offers.

It is to be expected that since these advantages are now known, industry will continue its expansion in the Southern States at an accelerated rate. Undoubtedly this expansion will continue for many years, and it is not at all unlikely that the South will someday be as noted for her manufacturing as she has been noted in the past for her agriculture. The prophecy of a great southern orator shall then become a reality. He said:

Far to the south lies the fairest and richest domain of this earth. It is the home of a brave and hospitable people. There is centered all that can please or prosper humankind. A perfect climate, above a fertile soil, yields to the husbandman every product of the Temperate Zone. There by night the cotton whitens beneath the stars, and by day the wheat locks the sunshine in its bearded sheaf. In the same field the clover steals the fragrance of the wind, and the tobacco catches the quick aroma of the rains. There are mountains stored with exhaustless treasures; forests, vast and primeval, and rivers that, tumbling or loitering, run wanton to the sea. Of the three essential items of all industries—cotton, iron, and wood—that region has easy control. In cotton, a fixed monopoly; in iron, proven supremacy; in timber, the reserve supply of the Republic. From this assured and permanent advantage, against which artificial conditions cannot much longer prevail, has grown an amazing system of industries. Not maintained by human contrivance of tariff or capital, afar off from the fullest and cheapest source of supply, but resting in divine assurance, within touch of field and mine and forest; not set amid costly farms from which competition has driven the farmer in despair, but amid cheap and sunny lands, rich with agriculture, to which neither season nor soil has set a limit; this system of industries is mounting to a splendor that shall dazzle and illumine the world.

PERSONAL ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Speaker, due to the fact that I had an important engagement at a Government department downtown, I was unable to be present for the quorum call today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ENGLE of California). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THE PUBLIC HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, during my entire service in the Congress, now approaching 12 years, I have maintained a consuming interest in all matters affecting the public health and welfare. The record has been made and it will establish that great progress has been made in the control and prevention of disease.

This progress has resulted from the combined efforts of patient, painstaking men and women engaged in the field of research and the continuous development and application of proven scientific and medical discoveries by the medical profession and those engaged in the field of sanitary engineering and preventive medicine. Recent mass advertising in the public press and over the radio causes me to wonder whether the American people are being taken for a ride. Articles have recently appeared in the Reader's Digest relating to various antihistamine cold preparations and with reference to certain laxatives. Through the advertising columns of the newspapers and radio air waves, alert manufacturers of these products are, in my opinion, making claims regarding the efficacy of these products which ought to receive immediate attention of the Federal Trade Commission.

It can be stated authoritatively, and what I shall state is stated with authority, that the Food and Drug Administration has most emphatically not endorsed any antihistamine cold preparations. The general public, I am afraid, is being led to believe that the effectiveness of these remedies has been vouched for by the Food and Drug Administration.

To understand just what that Administration has done about these products, we must understand the requirements of the Food and Drug and Cosmetic Act. The position of the Food and Drug Administration in administering the act must be clearly defined. All antihistamine cold preparations are new products under the terminology used in the drug section of the pure-food and drug law.

Under the drug section of the law, new products may not be shipped in interstate commerce until the proposed distributor has convincing evidence, and filed it with the Food and Drug Administration, acting for the Federal Security Agency, that the new product is safe for use under the conditions described, recommended, or suggested in the labeling on the container containing the remedy.

Antihistamic cold preparations now on the market have met this simple test. They are safe for use when taken as directed on the label. The Food and Drug Administration, therefore, have no alternative but to allow the new product applications filed with them to become effective. Before the Administration made the applications effective, it had before it evidence of very extensive use of the drug under the supervision of physicians. It had expressions of opinion of many of those physicians to the effect that, while they did not approve of self-medication, they conceded that in the dosage or frequency of use recommended these preparations were safe, and they would not harm the consuming public. The Administration had opinions, obtained on its own responsibility, from many experts who, again, while objecting to self-medication, discounted the likelihood of injury from the drugs in the doses recommended.

Finally, in view of the millions of doses dispensed on prescriptions by physicians during the past 4 years, it has received only a trifling number of consumer complaints.

In this connection it might be pointed out that the ordinary antihistamic cold preparations that are now being offered for sale to the public generally contain 50 percent or less of the dosage ordinarily prescribed by physicians heretofore. Thus, it is clear that under existing law the Pure Food and Drug Administration—which I may say is now under attack from many sources; letters are pouring in to them from all over the country, many of which have come to me individually attacking the Pure Food and Drug Administration because of its failure to stop what these writers claim are fraudulent claims in the advertising being made as to the effectiveness of these remedies. Under the law it is clear that the Food and Drug Administration is not called upon to determine the effectiveness of the drug, but is only required to make sure that if the drug is taken by the public in accordance with the dosage prescribed on the label it will not be harmful. This has been done by the Pure Food and Drug Administration. Immediately, when these new proprietary remedies have received registration with the Food and Drug Administration, the country is flooded with a tremendous variety and many types of so-called antihistamic cold preparations, all of which no doubt use one of the three basic drugs.

I call your attention to some clippings which I casually took out of the press in Washington yesterday, advertising four of these preparations; quarter-page and full-page ads. All over the Nation, and on national radio programs, all four of them are advertising, claiming that their specific preparation is the one that has been recommended by someone. I think the public is entitled to know the best authoritative information on this particular subject.

I am amazed, in discussing it with Members of Congress, how many are not aware of the limitations on the authority of the Pure Food and Drug Administration to deal with this very problem.

I want it made crystal clear that antihistamic drugs have been in use for 4 years or more as treatments for allergy conditions, especially hay fever. They have been used on doctors' prescriptions quite satisfactorily for that period of time.

What does the term "antihistamine" mean? The term "antihistamine" means literally "against histamine." The recent medical view is that when a patient has hay fever, for example, the condition is caused by a sensitivity to certain outside factors such as pollen of various growing plants, feathers, house dust, animal dander, and so forth. The conditions caused by sensitization are called allergies. Among the various allergic conditions are asthma, hives, food sensitivity such as reactions to strawberries and lobster and even to milk. Such substances are called allergenic. When the patient is exposed to the allergenic substance to which he is sensitive, the medical theory is that these allergenic substances release in the body a substance known as histamine.

Antihistamines are so called because they appear to have the property of neutralizing the effect of histamines. They have been extensively and successfully used by doctors in relieving the acute symptoms of hay fever. They have not been so effective in relieving symptoms of asthma, which is usually due to an allergic condition.

I want the RECORD to show clearly that there are three basic antihistamine drugs. There are at least 40 or 50 of these preparations which are being advertised in the press all over the country, but there are only three basic drugs. I shall not attempt to name them; the drug names are very technical and quite long, but the normal vocabulary can be used to describe these three drugs. One of them is described under its trade name by the pharmaceutical manufacturer as Trimeton; another is Neohetrymine; and another is called Neoantergan. There are three of them, and every one of these cold preparations that are on the market contain at least one of these basic drugs; many of them contain the same basic drug. It should be definitely known to a person when he picks up one of these ads and reads that it is a new drug—here is one, Anahist, described as "a new miracle drug, just discovered"; and there are many more just like it. The fact of the matter is that the word "Anahist" does not describe that drug at all; it describes the manufacturer's name given his proprietary preparation, but the drug used in that preparation is the drug neohetrymine, which is a basic drug. So I could go on down 10 or 15 others and show the type and character of the basic drug that has been used.

It should be definitely known to the American people that in making these applications to the Food and Drug Administration, the Administration in nowise has endorsed the sweeping claims now being made for the prevention or cure of colds; it expressed skepticism and expresses that skepticism as to the ability of these products to do what is claimed for them, particularly in the advertising that is going over the radio and the advertising that appears in the public press. Here is the danger, Mr. Speaker: While these preparations have shown that they are effective in the treatment of allergic conditions, allergies causing a sniffling, I am fearful that the person who has a cold caused by a virus infection, for example, relying upon this advertising may resort to self-medication in the hope that he can cure himself in 20 minutes, as some of the advertising states, when there is no clinically established factual basis for any such statement. So that a person who may be suffering from a virus infection that is serious could find other complications developing because of his placing himself under self-medication and failing to get the best medical advice he can to take care of a virus infection sometimes erroneously called a cold.

The Food and Drug Administration concedes that in the case of some colds the allergic type of symptoms will be relieved. It should be noted and understood by the American people that the Food, Drug, and Cosmetics Act restricts the Administration's authority over misrepresentation to false and misleading statements appearing either on the labels or on the container or in the literature that accompanies the container. It has absolutely no control over the claims that are made by radio or in the public press. It has no authority whatsoever to question these claims that are constantly being made to the American people. Yet, Members of Congress with whom I have talked, and I have spoken to many, have asked me the question: Why does not the Food and Drug Administration do something about this? People are writing to me and many are writing to the Pure Food and Drug Administration asking: Why does not the Food and Drug Administration do something about it? The fact is that Dr. Dunbar, and the other faithful and splendid men in charge of that Administration, having the public interest always in mind, have done everything that existing law will permit to be done in order to protect the interests of the American consumer.

My interest in this matter, may I say to my colleagues, is prompted by the fact that for a number of years I have tried to secure necessary and needed amendments to the pure food and drug law which would enable the Food and Drug Administration to give proper protection to the American people. I have a resolution pending before the Rules Committee now—it has been there for over a year—asking for action that would set up a committee of investigation on this and other related public-health questions which will enable us to get the facts and thus on the basis of real facts and information pass, if necessary, needed remedial legislation.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. EVINS. I should like to commend the gentleman for his excellent exposition of the authority of the Food and Drug Administration. It has jurisdiction, as he has so well stated, only with respect to labeling, whereas the Federal Trade Commission has jurisdiction over advertising, over the radio and in the public press. The question which the gentleman complains about of false advertising may well be referred to the Federal Trade Commission for the correction of that advertising, but as far as correction of what is placed on the brand label, or on the label, that is a matter of jurisdiction, as the gentleman stated, for the Pure Food and Drug Administration.

Mr. KEEFE. The danger in the situation, as the gentleman knows is this: The American people have been taught to believe they have a great protective agency down here known as the Food and Drug Administration and they have depended upon that agency to protect the American consumer. They do not know that the word "efficacy" is not found in the drug section of the pure food and drug law. That word is not there. They have no right to pass upon the conflicting claims as to the efficacy of these drugs. They can only pass upon the question as to whether the consumer who takes the remedy in the dosage recommended on the label will be injured.

Mr. EVINS. Would the gentleman not state that there should be a clear definition of the jurisdiction as between the Federal Trade Commission and the Food and Drug Administration?

Mr. KEEFE. I think that is very definitely necessary.

Mr. Speaker, the Food and Drug Administration concedes that in the case of some colds the allergic type of symptoms might be relieved. It should be known and understood by the American people that the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act restricts the Administration's authority over misrepresentation to false or misleading statements appearing on labels or in literature accompanying the package. It has no authority over separate advertising claims. It should also be borne in mind that the new drug section of the law does not contain the word "efficacy." In passing on a new drug application therefore the Food and Drug Administration must make the application effective if it concludes that the drug is safe for use provided it is taken in accordance with the directions stated on the label. If it has doubts as to the effectiveness of the drug to do the things claimed, it can only advise the proposed distributor of its doubts and inform him that any such claims are made on the manufacturer's own responsibility and will be subject to legal action for misbranding if they are found to be false or misleading. The Food and Drug Administration cannot institute an action alleging misbranding in the courts solely because it has a suspicion that curative claims are untrue. It must have evidence that will convince courts and juries that such claims are false or misleading. Such evidence is not available with respect to antihistamine cold preparations at the present time. The reason for this is that colds are due to many causes. There is medical evidence that some are due to allergies. It is entirely probable that such colds will be helped by the antihistamine cold preparations. It may take several years of very comprehensive medical research and study to determine whether or not the claims now being made for these drugs are true or false. Unless or until convincing scientific evidence is obtained, the Food and Drug Administration cannot undertake legal action.

I am making this statement merely to answer the complaints that are being registered with the Food and Drug Administration, some of which have come to my personal attention. For several years I have advocated an amendment to the food and drug sections of existing law that would require the proponent of a new drug, or the proponent of a new chemical to be introduced into the food supplies of the Nation, to submit convincing evidence of the effectiveness of the drug or the lack of toxicity occasioned by the introduction of new chemicals into the food supply, and to establish by convincing clinical findings before it is placed on the market for over-counter sale that the new drug or the new chemical is not only effective but that it will not injure the consumer.

Mr. Speaker, I have had pending before the Rules Committee for a considerable period of time Resolution 207 calling for an investigation by a committee of Congress of certain phases of this very important question. I trust that the Rules Committee will review the hearings already had upon the resolution and submit it to the Congress for immediate action. The existing food and drug law administered by the Federal Security Agency is ineffective in its present form. It should be amended and strengthened in the interests of protecting the consuming public. In my opinion the administration should be granted the right to subpena in order to ascertain facts. It has no such power under existing law. The resolution which I have referred to is a step in the direction of securing facts upon which to base remedial legislation to deal with this ever-growing threat to public welfare and health.

It must be definitely understood that in no sense do I oppose the march of scientific progress or the ulilization of the products of medical and scientific research and development, but I do feel that if the facts disclosed in such a fair and open hearing demonstrate the necessity, as I believe those facts will demonstrate, then the Government through the Food and Drug Administration should be vested with the power and the right to insist that those who seek to put new drugs on the market or new chemicals into the food or pharmaceutical supplies of the Nation shall first be required to prove that they are not only safe but effective in accordance with the claims made for them.

I sincerely trust that this great and important public-health problem may be dealt with effectively at this session of the Congress.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, as in reverence we hallow Thy name, so may we hallow our own, keeping our honor bright, our hearts pure, our ideals untarnished, and our devotion to the Nation's weal high and true. Amid the tensions of these terrific days we seek in Thy presence a saving experience of inner quiet and certainty. Unworthy though we are, Thou hast made us keepers of the holy flame of freedom the fathers kindled with their lives.

We would be Thy ministers of abiding peace. Make us true servants of the common good and forerunners of Thy kingdom's coming. In the Redeemer's name. Amen.

PETITION

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina presented a resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of South Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, as follows:

House resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to enact certain legislation now pending in order to effect an increase in the retirement pay of all railroad employees

Whereas the retirement pay for railroad employees in this country has been so meager in the past that it has been necessary for many railroad engineers, conductors, and other employees of this country's vast railroad system to work beyond the age at which they are eligible to retire; and

Whereas many of these employees are engineers and conductors engaged in operating high-powered Diesel trains; and

Whereas the operation of such high-powered trains by employees of over 70 years of age has and will greatly increase the safety hazards of modern railroad trains; and

Whereas there is now pending by the Congress of the United States of America a bill authored by the Honorable JOHN L. MCMILLAN, Member of Congress from the Sixth District of the State of South Carolina, providing for a 20-percent increase in retirement pay for all railroad employees; and

Whereas the necessary cost of such pay increase will be borne by the employee and employer without cost to the taxpayers of this country: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, memorialized to enact the McMillan bill or such other legislation as will result in an increase in retirement pay for the railroad employees of this country; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Members of the House of Representatives and to the Members of the United States Senate from South Carolina.

PROHIBITION OF LIQUOR ADVERTISING—PETITION

Mr. MCCARTHY. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, a letter in the nature of a petition signed by Mrs. Grace Outcelt and Graham Outcelt of Viroqua, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the advertising of liquor over the radio.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VIROQUA, WIS., January 11, 1950.

Senator JOSEPH MCCARTHY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MCCARTHY: Would you kindly consider us as sincere supporters of the Langer-Bryson bill to prohibit liquor advertising on the radio?

We would be grateful indeed if this bill passes so radios could be used for the betterment of American homes, instead of another means of helping the liquor traffic.

Please insert this in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Yours for a Christian America.

GRACE OUTCELT.
GRAHAM OUTCELT.

EXTENSION OF OLD-AGE AND SURVIVORS BENEFITS TO FARMERS

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, resolutions adopted by the National Grange, at Sacramento, Calif., and the American Farm Bureau Federation, at Chicago, Ill., favoring the enactment of legislation to extend old-age and survivors benefits to farmers.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF NATIONAL GRANGE RESOLUTION ON EXTENSION OF OASI COVERAGE TO AGRICULTURE ADOPTED AT THE ANNUAL CONVENTION, SACRAMENTO, CALIF., NOVEMBER 16–26, 1949

We have considered the report of the Interim Committee on Social Security appointed pursuant to resolution adopted at the Eighty-second session and endorse that section of the national master's address, Social Security for Farmers, and recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Whereas (1) the old-age assistance program is a heavy financial burden in many States and will become increasingly so, and (2) the old-age and survivors insurance program is a plan whereby each worker during his working years must help to pay for the survivorship and retirement benefits; and

"Whereas (1) the old-age and survivors insurance program has not been extended to farm people, and (2) many difficult problems will be encountered in its extension to farm people: Therefore be it

"Resolved, (1) That we favor extension of coverage to farm people on a trial basis working toward the perfection of a practical plan, (2) that coverage be extended to farm people in those States adopting appropriate legislation, (3) that the executive committee be authorized to advocate the Grange stand favoring general coverage of farm people if it is satisfied that the plan proposed is workable."

TEXT OF AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION RESOLUTION ON EXTENSION OF OASI COVERAGE TO AGRICULTURE ADOPTED AT THE ANNUAL CONVENTION, CHICAGO, ILL., DECEMBER 15, 1949

The Federal old-age and survivors insurance program under the Social Security Act provides a type of assistance which has become accepted as an integral part of our economic system. However, the total of direct payments by Federal and State governments to needy aged persons is constantly increasing. This trend must be changed by extending old-age insurance coverage and by establishing insurance benefits on at least a minimum subsistence level. Employees of general agricultural organizations should be covered. Farm labor should also be covered. If the extension is provided by law to include self-employed other than farmers, and is proved feasible and administratively practical, then careful consideration should be given by State and county farm bureaus to the question of the coverage of farm operators under the old-age and survivors insurance program.

(Mr. FREAR introduced Senate bill 2900, to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the settlement of New Castle, Del., which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. KEM:

S. J. Res. 147. Joint resolution giving the consent of Congress to an agreement between the State of Missouri and the State of Kansas establishing a boundary between said States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COMMEMORATION OF THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF SETTLEMENT OF NEW CASTLE, DEL.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the settlement of New Castle, Del., and I ask unanimous consent that an explanatory statement of the bill, prepared by me, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred, and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2900) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the three hundredth anniversary of the settlement of New Castle, Del., introduced by Mr. FREAR, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The statement presented by Mr. FREAR is as follows:

The General Assembly of Delaware, at its 1949 regular session, authorized the appointment by the Governor of a State commission to prepare a fitting commemoration, in 1951, of the tercentenary of the first permanent settlement by the Dutch on the Delaware River.

This settlement, made in the summer of 1651 at the site of New Castle and called Fort Casimir, later New Amstel (and finally, under the English, New Castle), served as the Dutch capital on the river.

Here (between 1651 and 1664) citizens of the Dutch Republic of that day claimed the rights and freedoms that were theirs in the homeland, and here were first established the free institutions that gave opportunity for the spirit and practice of self-government. The first town meetings on the Delaware were called together here to form ordinances for their own government; the people were given a voice in the election of their own local officers, and here the first courts of justice were established from which, in unbroken sequence, Delaware's present system of justice is derived.

From these Dutch people and these institutions—by infusion and growth among the people of other nations who followed as settlers on the Delaware—stemmed directly the generations who envisaged and fought for American independence that gave leaders to the formation of the Union and made Delaware the first State to ratify the Federal Constitution.

In the mellow old town of New Castle, heritage from the days of its founding by the Dutch is still manifest. The plan of the town with its strand by the river, its central green and surrounding streets, is unchanged, and direct descendants of the Dutch founders still live on the streets near the green, as well as throughout the State and the United States.

Because the town, that in the Dutch period was the cradle of self-government on the Delaware, became the capital of the colony and of the early State of Delaware—one of the 13 to form the Union—it is the authentic symbol as well as one of the few surviving unspoiled monuments of American beginnings.

It is with this high justification that the Dutch Tercentenary Commission of Delaware calls the attention of this Nation and of other nations to the celebration of the founding of New Castle to be held June 16, 1951.

I feel, Mr. President, that the approval by Congress for the authorization of a commemorative coin is amply justified in order to more fittingly observe this memorable occasion.

ADDITIONAL PERSONNEL FOR COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE

Mr. THOMAS of Utah submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 215), which was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare:

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is authorized, until otherwise provided by law, to employ one analyst and one additional clerical assistant to

SAVINGS EFFECTED IN THE GOVERNMENT — STATEMENT BY SENATOR McCLELLAN

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a statement which I have issued today, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, pointing out that more than $1,500,000 in direct savings have been effected by reason of the activities of the committee and its staff in pointing out and eliminating many useless forms that were in use in the various agencies of executive branches of the Government, and also by reason of the elimination of many useless reports which it had been the practice to make heretofore.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR JOHN L. M'CLELLAN, CHAIRMAN, SENATE COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Senator JOHN L. McCLELLAN, chairman of the Senate Committee on Expenditurer in the Executive Departments, stated today that as a result of studies initiated by the committee staff more than 2 years ago, savings running into several millions of dollars have been effectuated in the Government in eliminating unnecessary forms and reports.

The Comptroller General, Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a request from this committee entered into a joint agreement about 2 years ago for the development of a cooperative program designed to integrate budgeting, accounting, and financial reporting throughout the Federal Government on a simplified and consolidated basis. As a direct result of this action, an Accounting Systems Division was created in the General Accounting Office and a program initiated under which reports and existing financial procedures were reviewed by the affected agencies with the objective of eliminating useless reports and nonproductive operating procedures.

Joint survey and review committees were established under the direction of the Accounting Systems Division, each specializing in designated fields of endeavor. Following recommendations made by these special committees, specific improvements in public administration were effectuated, and simplified voucher payment and collection procedures have eliminated duplicate handling of documents to Washington.

The staff of the Senate Committee on Expenditures has worked in close cooperation with representatives of the General Accounting Office, the Bureau of the Budget, and the Department of the Treasury in effectuating new accounting systems and adopting new processes of installation in many agencies employing the accrual system of account keeping, the application of comprehensive and site audit procedures, and the development of property accounting under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949.

A summation of accomplishments under this program reveals that from a detailed analysis of 47 outstanding forms and procedure cases a total of 362 forms were abolished, and 86 improved forms substituted therefor, with a number of special cases further reducing the documentation to an even greater degree. Savings as a direct result of this activity on the part of the staff of the Senate Committee on Expenditures will, when fully activated, probably total between two and three millions of dollars, and additional economies will develop as the program progresses.

Savings already effectuated, directly attributable to this program, include (1) the abolition of 11 positions in the Department of Justice which carried an annual pay roll of $33,000, and net savings in printing attributable to the abolition of such positions of about $5,000; (2) initial equipment orders canceled in the Veterans' Administration totaling $888,000, through improvements in present systems and the proposed installation of more efficient methods; and, (3) the elimination of 450 additional employees who were scheduled to have been added to the Federal pay roll to process systems and forms now eliminated, aggregating a total pay roll estimated at $701,500. Therefore, a direct annual saving of $1,636,500 can be attributed to these efforts to date.

In addition to the forms abolished appropriate administrative reporting forms are being substituted for standard Forms 1116, 1117, and 1118 which will when fully effectuated bring about additional savings, which cannot be accurately estimated at this time. Nor can an accurate estimate be made of savings effectuated through time spent by innumerable employees formerly assigned to the compilation of these and many other similar useless and duplicating reports.

NEW ENGLAND BITUMINOUS COAL RECEIPTS

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have placed in the RECORD a table showing the bituminous coal receipts in New England for the calendar years 1939 to 1949, inclusive. The table shows that the receipts in 1949 were about half what they had been in previous years. I am also informed that receipts of anthracite are away down, and that if the weather turns cold the supply will become dangerously low in 3 or 4 days.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

New England bituminous coal receipts for calendar years 1939 to 1949, inclusive, all net tons

GOVERNOR DRISCOLL'S INAUGURATION—EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, I had the privilege on Tuesday last of attending the inaugural ceremonies of Gov. Alfred E. Driscoll, of New Jersey, who for the first time in the history of New Jersey and under our new State constitution was reelected governor for a second consecutive term.

My distinguished colleague [Mr. HENDRICKSON], yesterday inserted in the RECORD, Governor Driscoll's outstanding inaugural address. I am glad to join with my colleague in urging the Members of the Senate to study the important suggestions the Governor makes.

There appeared in the New York Herald Tribune this morning, an editorial entitled "Governor Driscoll's Inauguration," and I ask unanimous consent that this editorial may be inserted in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOVERNOR DRISCOLL'S INAUGURATION

For the first time in New Jersey's history a governor has succeeded himself; and it seems a good omen that the new constitutional provision should permit the continuance of a regime as enlightened and promising as Governor Driscoll's. In his address at Trenton on Tuesday, Mr. Driscoll summed up the philosophy which has guided him through many reforms and improvements in State administration and on the basis of which he hopes for further improvements in the term ahead. He spoke of an orderly Federal system, with government close to the people, prudently managed; of government strong enough and courageous enough to pioneer with the times, promoting the general welfare in the service of all its people. Mr. Driscoll made it plain that the fight against excessive centralization and power in the Central Government can be successfully waged only if the States are alert and vigorous in meeting the people's needs. Such a measure as a tri-State water authority, which he called for in his program, is a clear example of what States can accomplish by their own exertions and by cooperation among them.

Governor Driscoll won reelection in a year that was marked by many defeats and disappointments for Republicans. His victory was a proof that an administration which gets close to the people, showing itself concerned with their problems and vigilant in advancing their interests, does not have to be extravagant or demagogic in order to win the voters' approval. In wishing the Governor good luck for his second term, we hope that his success will be a harbinger of many similar Republican victories.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I also ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to have printed in the RECORD at this point an editorial entitled "Mr. Driscoll's Aims," published in the Newark Evening News of January 18, 1950, and an editorial entitled "States Must Lead Fight Against Centralized Power," published in the Philadelphia Inquirer of January 18, 1950.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Newark Evening News of January 18, 1950]

MR. DRISCOLL'S AIMS

In beginning his second term at Trenton, Governor Driscoll realistically outlines as the first order of business the completion of tasks begun during his first.

Aside from water-supply development on a moderate scale and highway expansion under the new turnpike authority, Mr. Driscoll launches no large new State projects. His is a message designed to fit the public mood and, equally important, the public purse. Essentially the admonition he addressed to the legislature is: Hold that spending line.

This does not mean, as special pleaders would have us believe, the end of progress at Trenton. Far from it.

"The social cost of slums and the need for slum clearance is just as great as ever," says Mr. Driscoll. A stand-by residential rent law, in event the Federal act expires, is high on the Governor's list. The need for such protection is demonstrated by the analysis of National Housing Expediter Woods. He has shown that decontrol in six large cities was followed by rent increases ranging from a moderate 16.2 percent to as much as 41.3 percent.

Still in the field of housing, Mr. Driscoll calls for creation of a State building codes commission. Its duty would be to dispel existing confusion caused by 179 different municipal codes, most of them over age, and nearly all helping to stifle low-cost housing.

Mr. Driscoll reveals plans for better correlation of welfare services under State control, the elimination of inequities in the workmen's compensation act, a more comprehensive minimum-wage law, and increased sickness and unemployment benefits "if our insurance programs are to accomplish their purpose." All these suggest that, under a hold-the-line policy, government does not stand still.

A State water authority to complete the modest Delaware and Raritan supply project is suggested by the Governor. If the legislature assents, he believes it should be authorized to develop new sources of supply. There is no recommendation that this new creation should replace any of the numerous water agencies now at large. Indeed, Mr. Driscoll proposes, in addition, a tri-State water authority to negotiate with New York and Pennsylvania on allocation of Delaware River water among the three States. In view of the trend toward consolidation at Trenton, the question arises as to whether or not one water authority, in good working order, couldn't prevent diffusion of effort which these projected and present agencies seem to imply.

Mr. Driscoll reminds us that the State's tax and revenue problem will be under continuing study. Recommended reading for the students, we suggest, are the income-tax returns in New York State which have hit, in 9 months at the new rates, an astronomical $202,764,000 on personal incomes. It is satisfying to note that Mr. Driscoll also recommends an extension of the tax-revenue inquiry to municipal governments.

The question of regulation of giant trucks is discussed and Mr. Driscoll, as have other highway users, sees a need for uniform regulations in this field. The hard question of higher fees for giant interstate carriers is not mentioned, possibly on the score that this phase of the matter should await proper integration with the general revenue problem.

There is another phase of the Governor's message, national in tone, which obviously is for more than local consumption. Here Mr. Driscoll cites the Hoover report to support his own apprehension of big government, and he restates his demand for reallocation of taxing powers to obviate the necessity for gigantic Federal grants-in-aid. Attendant evils of this system, as the Governor sees them, are unnecessarily high administrative costs and abnormally high Federal taxes. Worse, he thinks, it is a system which breeds a centralization of government he deplores. In a word, the Governor would substitute for big government responsive, serviceable State governments and interstate cooperation in problems mutually affecting neighbor States.

If the Republican Party, in a continuing search for a new set of principles to guide it, wants the Driscoll idea of national policy, this, in part, is it.

[From the Philadelphia Enquirer of January 18, 1950]

STATES MUST LEAD FIGHT AGAINST CENTRALIZED POWER

Gov. Alfred E. Driscoll's views on the need for States to recover—and exercise—their traditional powers, reaffirmed at his inaugural ceremonies in Trenton, have an importance extending far beyond the borders of his own State of New Jersey.

For the trend toward centralization of power in the Federal Government which Driscoll criticizes is more than a transfer of power from one governmental unit to another. It signifies the gradual separation of the Government from the people it is supposed to serve.

There's no doubt this separation has been taking place, with bad results for the people and their local governmental units. Matters concerning the individual are not decided on the basis of knowledge of needs and local conditions. They are decided by officials far away, who, as Driscoll observed, move from crisis to crisis to justify their grabs for power.

All over the Nation we've seen the effects. Instead of handling their own problems locally, people are encouraged to look to Washington. The Federal Government gladly takes over, and further builds up an administrative hodgepodge which is costly and inefficient.

As the first New Jersey Governor to succeed himself in over a century, Driscoll has tried to reverse this trend by asserting the State's own powers with a forward-looking program. In his inaugural address, he pledged himself to continue his efforts to improve housing, workmen's compensation, labor relations, and many other programs on the basis of local initiative and action.

That approach is needed by all States if they are to retain their rightful places in the Federal system. But they cannot do the whole job alone. The Federal Government has to move out of fields where the States have a prior right to act, and particularly must be made to stop its present policies of drying up tax sources which now make it difficult for States to finance their own programs.

The Driscoll program of aggressive, forward-looking action by the States to battle Federal centralization merits the attention of Republican Party policymakers. More important, it demands the support of citizens in every State who want to see our traditional system of government maintained.

WHAT WOULD YOU CUT?—EDITORIAL FROM THE PITTSBURGH PRESS

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I have a very interesting letter from a lady in Pennsylvania enclosing an editorial from the Pittsburgh Press of January 9, 1950, entitled "What Would You Cut?" She asked me to read the editorial into the RECORD, but I shall not take the time of the Senate to do so. Instead I ask unanimous consent that the editorial may be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT WOULD YOU CUT?

That is the question the taxers and spenders usually ask, with a triumphant smirk, when anyone suggests that the Government ought to stop spending more money than it's got.

Their smug assumption is that, if you specify where to spend less, you will immediately arouse the angry protest of some pressure group.

Well, what of that? All of us are taxpayers. If we really get stirred up about the way our money is being wasted and our future mortgaged, we can be the most formidable pressure group of all.

The answer to the taxers' and spenders' question is simple:

Cut everything.

Cut the farm subsidies. Reduce all subsidies. Cut the rivers and harbors and highway and housing appropriations. Curb the lending powers of Government corporations. Reduce the amounts the Army and Navy and Air Force can spend. Pare down European aid. Cut the pay rolls. Put an economy and efficiency team to work in the Veterans' Administration to cut out the obvious wastes and abuses in administering the GI bill of rights, and empty the hospital beds of nonservice-connected cases.

We could fill this page listing places and activities where money can be saved without diminishing any really essential Government service, and without weakening the national defense.

There is excess fat in the Federal budget from the Agriculture Department and Atomic Energy Commission all the way through the alphabet. The Government habitually hires at least three people to do what could be done better and at less cost by two.

The toughest place to cut will be in the $5,000,000,000 annual interest bill on the public debt. But we can cut that, too. We can do it by taking the money saved by stopping waste elsewhere, and using that money to start reducing the quarter-of-a-trillion debt. As we shrink the principal, we shrink the interest bill.

We cannot do all this by saying, "We're for economy, but * * *." What we must say is, "We're for economy, period." And that must mean cutting all the way down the line. We must stop spending money we haven't got for things we cannot afford.

THE COAL SITUATION IN SOUTH DAKOTA

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD several telegrams I have received from South Dakota dealing with the desperate coal situation existing there. As everyone who has looked at the weather map knows, we have had in South Dakota subzero temperatures, 29 below, 20 below, 15 below, and generally very cold weather. An emergent condition exists in South Dakota, as proved by these sample telegrams, only half a dozen of which I offer for the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ABERDEEN, S. DAK.,
January 15, 1950.

CHAN GURNEY,
Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Coal shortages due to strike have reached an emergency stage in our city and surrounding territory and conditions most serious. Survey by our mayor shows coal supply so low that he has called for rationing of fuel. School board advise that they have a 3-day supply on hand, and if not replenished schools will have to close. Hospital which serves entire northeast quarter of State advise they have enough coal on hand or in transit to carry them through; but if railroads have to further curtail service, will the coal arrive? We urge you to do everything in your power to see that President Truman makes use of the Taft-Hartley Act in this serious emergency. As you know, we have had extremely cold weather. It was 15 below this morning and has been below zero for days.

Hon. CHAN GURNEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

The morning papers announced that President Truman continues his refusal to consider a national emergency existing in the coal situation. The drastic curtailment of trains into this area because of coal shortage is resulting in inefficiency in our wholesale and retail operations and a 25-percent increase in plant labor. To us and thousands of other small manufacturers and processors such a condition is most emphatically an emergency. May we respectfully request your assistance in obtaining immediate action to correct this intolerable situation.

Truman's refusal to consider the coal situation an emergency resulting in delays, inefficiency, needless costs in our business. Rail curtailment extremely disadvantageous to us. Respectfully urge that you lend your weight to immediate efforts to prevent coal miners from jeopardizing the national interest.

Hon. CHAN GURNEY,

For the second time in recent months we are now obliged to endure restricted railroad service on account of coal shortages. This is inconveniencing our people, interfering with our mail service, and hampering our business. Vermillion people are sick and tired of being at the mercy of the whims of John L. Lewis. We call on our Government to carry out their obligations to put a prompt end to this preposterous situation.

A. E. GODFREY,
Chairman of the Board of Trustees.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a copy of a letter which I wrote to the President on the subject of the coal shortage in South Dakota, a few days ago.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 16, 1950.

President HARRY S. TRUMAN,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The shortage of coal in South Dakota has created an emergency condition, and unless remedial action is taken immediately, actual human suffering will result. Business has been generally disrupted, and the threat of cold schools and hospitals within the new few days is very real.

From Aberdeen, S. Dak., a city of approximately 20,000, comes the following information:

"Survey by our mayor shows coal supply so low that he has called for rationing of fuel. School board advises that they have a 3-day supply on hand and if not replenished, schools will have to close. Hospital which serves entire northeast quarter of South Dakota advises they have enough coal on hand or in transit to carry them through, but if railroads have to further curtail service, will the coal arrive? It was 15 below this morning and has been below zero for days."

From the Mayor of Mobridge, S. Dak., a city of 5,000 wholly dependent on coal for all heating purposes, comes the following:

"What can be done about coal situation? None on hand. Twenty-five degrees below. Blizzard conditions. Need help desperately. Wire answer today."

The president of the chamber of commerce in Vermillion, S. Dak., a city of 5,000 in the southeastern corner of the State, wires:

"For the second time in recent months we are now obliged to endure restricted railroad service on account of coal shortages. This is inconveniencing our people. Interfering with our mail service and hampering our business. Vermillion people are sick and tired of being at the mercy of the whims of John L. Lewis. We call on our Government to carry out their obligations to put a prompt end to this preposterous situation."

The foregoing are typical of many telegrams that I have received over this weekend. I urge you to take whatever action is necessary to correct a situation that is approaching disaster proportions in South Dakota and other northwest States.

Sincerely yours,

CHAN GURNEY.

Mr. GURNEY. Mr. President, something must be done quickly and adequately in order to relieve the emergency in my State. The coal emergency is worse in other States, because, believe it or not, it is colder in other States than it is in South Dakota. It is 42 degrees in North Dakota. Trains are being cut off. There is not adequate mail service there. The desperate coal-shortage situation makes it mandatory that prompt action be taken to alleviate conditions.

AMENDMENT OF THE HATCH ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1243) to amend the Hatch Act.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate adopted the motion to make the bill (H. R. 1243) to amend the Hatch Act, the unfinished business of the Senate. Subsequently the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] moved to take up another bill on the calendar relating to excise taxes. In order that the Senate may be advised as to what is being proposed to be set aside, I should like briefly to discuss the bill.

As it passed the House the bill provided for an amendment to section 9 (b) of the Hatch Act. Section 9 (a) of that act provides that—

It shall be unlawful for any person employed in the executive branch of the Federal Government, or any agency or department thereof, to use his official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with an election or affecting the result thereof. No officer or employee in the executive branch of the Federal Government, or any agency or department thereof, shall take any active part in political management or in political campaigns. All such persons shall retain the right to vote as they may choose and to express their opinions on all political subjects—

And candidates.

The bill does not change that part of section 9. It merely modifies the penalty provision, which reads:

(b) Any person violating the provisions of this section shall be immediately removed from the position or office held by him, and thereafter no part of the funds appropriated by any act of Congress for such position or office shall be used to pay the compensation of such person.

The result of that drastic penalty is that throughout the United States there have arisen a number of instances of persons guilty of merely a technical violation of the law being summarily removed from office, and there is no law which will permit them to be reinstated under any circumstances.

So the House of Representatives passed this bill amending the penalty clause by providing that—

(b) If in the case of any person violating the provisions of this section it is found by the United States Civil Service Commission that such violation warrants removal he shall be immediately removed from the position or office held by him, and thereafter no part of the funds appropriated by any act of Congress for such position or office shall be used to pay the compensation of such person. If the Commission—

The Senate committee has amended the House bill at that point by inserting the words "by unanimous vote"; and then the bill as passed by the House continues, as follows—finds that the violation does not warrant removal, a lesser penalty shall be imposed by direction of the Commission: Provided, That in—

And this is a further committee amendment—

no case shall the penalty be less than a 15-day suspension from duty without pay: And provided further, That in—

Then the bill as unanimously passed by the House continues, as follows—the case of any person who has heretofore been removed from the service under the provisions of this section, the Commission shall upon request reopen and reconsider the record in such case. If it shall find—

As a further amendment by the Senate committee, we insert at this point the words "by a unanimous vote." Then the House version of the bill continues, as follows—that the acts committed were such as to warrant a penalty of less than removal it shall issue an order revoking the restriction against reemployment in the position from which removed, or in any other position for which he may be qualified.

This bill passed the House unanimously, Mr. President. It came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration. A hearing was held on the bill by the full committee on April 13, at which time the president of the Civil Service Commission, Harry B. Mitchell, appeared and urged that the bill be enacted, citing numerous instances which appear in the committee report and records, in which for very minor offenses the Commission was compelled to remove persons from the service.

In support of his statement, he read a letter addressed to him by the author of the Hatch Act, which is included in the record. This is what Senator HATCH said:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS AND SURVEYS,
September 12, 1945.

Hon. HARRY B. MITCHELL,
President, United States Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MITCHELL: I have a carbon copy of your letter of September 7 addressed to Senator MCCARRAN concerning the case of the post-office clerk in the Philadelphia Post Office who is about to be dismissed for a violation of the so-called Hatch Act.

As I have told you on previous occasions, I favor the granting of discretionary power as contained in the Magnuson bill, and I agree with you that this bill should be reported favorably and hope it will be done promptly.

I am sending a copy of this letter to Senator MCCARRAN.

As you suggest in your letter, the passage of this law would not benefit the employee whose case you mention unless the bill were made retroactive. I wish you would have your legal department draft and prepare, if possible, an amendment to the Magnuson bill granting authority to the Commission to authorize the employment or reinstatement of all employees who have been dismissed under the Hatch Act where that dismissal constituted a penalty out of proportion to the offense committed.

Very truly yours,

CARL A. HATCH.

That letter was written in 1945, when the Senator from Washington [Mr. MAGNUSON] had pending a bill to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. As I understand this bill is an attempt to remove or reduce the penalty for violation of the main feature of the Hatch Act. In other words, the Hatch Act says—and this is a statement of what the offense is:

SEC. 9. (a) It shall be unlawful for any person employed in the executive branch of the Federal Government, or any agency or department thereof, to use his official authority or influence for the purpose of interfering with an election or affecting the result thereof. No officer or employee in the executive branch of the Federal Government, or any agency or department thereof, shall take any active part in political management or in political campaigns. All such persons shall retain the right to vote as they may choose and to express their opinions on all political subjects.

I suggest to the Senator that a 15-day suspension from duty without pay is merely a slap on the wrist, and that the effect of such a change would be absolutely to nullify the Hatch Act. If we are to pass this measure, we might just as well agree that there will not be any Hatch Act left, so far as the main provision which I have just read is concerned.

Mr. HAYDEN. If the Senator from Ohio will listen to a reading of some of the cases which have arisen, I am quite sure he will feel that the act should be modified in some degree.

In the form in which the bill passed the House of Representatives, there would be no penalty at all; that is to say, if the Commission determined that the offense did not warrant complete removal from the service, the employee could be reinstated. That provision has been amended by the Senate committee to require a unanimous vote of the Commission, so that a political majority of the Commission could not restore such an employee. That is one improvement the committee has made in the bill as passed by the House. The other improvement the committee has made is to provide that there shall be a penalty of at least 15 days of suspension or removal.

Mr. TAFT. Does the Senator from Arizona know of any other case in which the Civil Service Commission is given the power to act as a court and to conduct an extensive hearing on the question of whether a Federal Government employee has been engaged in political activity? If it is desired to substitute some other penalty for the rather drastic penalty now imposed by the act, should not it be a criminal penalty, with the matter to be taken before a court, rather than to be left to the Civil Service Commission, which it seems to me is the wrong body to decide such cases.

Mr. HAYDEN. Let me read a résumé of some of the cases which have been decided by the Commission. For instance:

1. Post-office clerk, 58 years of age, with over 14 years of service in the Philadelphia post office. Complaint was received alleging that this clerk had circulated a nominating petition to qualify a candidate on the Democratic ticket for the office of magistrate.

Investigation established that the complaint was true. However, it was also established that the candidate in question was himself a retired post-office clerk and a life-long friend of the accused employee, and that petition was circulated because of this long-standing friendship and not as a political party service. Supervisors, neighbors, friends, and local political leaders stated that the accused was an efficient Federal employee, an extremely good citizen, and established that he was not a politician in any sense of the word and was not prominently identified with any political party or political faction. Employee admitted activity, and in view of the mandate of section 9 (b) of the Hatch Act was removed even though he was less than 2 years from retirement age.

2. Clerical employee in Army hospital in New Jersey was the widowed mother of three minor children and had been in the service as a war-service appointee for only a short period of time. Inquiry was received by the Commission reporting that this employee was a candidate for election as member of county Republican committee. Investigation established that employee had long been active in civic affairs and was interested in better local roads, improved tax assessment methods, and other normal civic association activities. Investigation established that the accused had been informed by friends that she could do more toward improving the local situation if she were to become a member of the Republican committee in this normally Republican county. At the solicitation of these same friends, the employee became a candidate and was elected to the county committee. However, upon hearing that there was some question of the propriety of this action by a Federal employee, she immediately resigned without attending any committee meetings other than the one at which she submitted her resignation. Employee admitted the candidacy for the partisan office and her removal under section 9 (b) of the Hatch Act was mandatory.

3. Veteran of World War I: Former Virginia State policeman, father of four children (three minors) was released from the State police because of his poor health and accepted a war-service appointment in a low-paying civilian position at the United States Marine Corps air station at Quantico, Va. This man had been interested in becoming local sheriff for some time, and shortly after receiving his Federal war-service appointment filed in the Democratic primary for sheriff. Investigation established that this employee had no knowledge of the restrictions of the Hatch Act, that he did not conduct an extensive campaign, and that he was defeated in the primary election. Employee readily admitted all details of his political activity and his removal was required, even though he had been in the service for less than 1 year at the time of filing his declaration of candidacy in the primary.

4. War Department contract negotiator, employed in Massachusetts, with 3 years of Federal service. Complaint received that employee was Republican candidate for the office of town water commissioner. Investigation established that in this particular town the water commissioner's office was filled on a partisan ballot. However, the same investigation also established that in the neighboring towns throughout the area water commissioners were designated at nonpartisan town meetings and that under the circumstances Federal employees could seek election as water commissioners in these neighboring towns. Employee readily admitted that he was a candidate for water commissioner and stated that he thought this was permissible as no active campaign was necessary. This employee was removed from the service even though he had no Democratic opposition in the election and, of course, was not required to conduct an extensive campaign.

5. Civilian patrolman employed by an Army air base in Montana: This man was a veteran of World War II and after less than 9 months of Federal employment filed as Democratic candidate for sheriff. Investigation established that this man had not been fully instructed on the political activity restrictions of the Hatch Act and was under the impression that he could be a partisan candidate if he took leave from his Federal job during the campaign period. This employee readily admitted his candidacy and voluntarily resigned as soon as he heard that his activity during his period of leave was questionable. Under section 9 (b) of the Hatch Act this veteran had to be removed even though he acted on an erroneous interpretation of the law and had been employed in the Federal service for less than 1 year.

Mr. TAFT. When the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, Mr. Hatch, wrote this law, he knew of that situation. It was absolutely known when the Senate passed the bill. The Congress chose to impose that drastic penalty because the Members of Congress felt it was the only way by which political activity on the part of Federal employees could be stopped.

It certainly seems to me that to leave the entire matter to the discretion of the Civil Service Commission, which is practically what the bill proposes, would be to go from one extreme to the other, from the extreme of too drastic a penalty to something which will be no penalty at all and will not operate as a restriction upon political activities by Federal employees.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have read the letter from Senator Hatch, the author of the bill, in which he stated that the provision was too drastic, and that he favored not only giving discretion to the Civil Service Commission in cases of this kind, but making the change retroactive in the cases of employees heretofore dismissed.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I wish to call the attention of the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio to the fact that the pending bill is a stronger bill than was the bill in the form in which it was unanimously passed by the House of Representatives.

The bill as recommended to be amended by the Senate committee provides that the Civil Service Commission in taking such action must be unanimous in holding that the violation does not warrant removal from office.

There are two types of violations under the Hatch Act. One is where a Federal employee uses his official position to influence an election. If he does that, I would say that undoubtedly the Commission would not be unanimous in deciding that he did not deserve removal. To the contrary, I would say the Commission would be unanimous in deciding that he should be removed. But even if the Commission were not unanimous in that ruling, the employee would have to be removed, under such circumstances.

The other type of violation, and the one sought to be relieved by this bill, is where a Federal employee engages in some minor type of political activity, primarily in a municipal or local or county election, where Federal officials are not involved. We have such a situation in Maryland and also in Virginia. The Civil Service Commission has ruled that if a civil-service employee operates by calling himself an independent, he can do what he pleases; he can agitate; he can electioneer; he can run for office. But the Commission has held that if a civil-service employee calls himself a Republican or calls himself a Democrat, he is beyond the pale.

I say to my distinguished friend that the Democrats as well as the Republicans in Virginia do not like that kind of discrimination. We have it in Arlington County. We have it in Montgomery County, Md. The independents have formed there to exclude both the Democrats and the Republicans from control of local affairs.

The distinguished Senator wanted to know whether the Civil Service Commission had ever gone into the question of political activity. I can tell him of an instance in Virginia, in Madison County, with respect to a fourth-class postmaster, who was a Democrat. An aspirant for that office learned that a Republican post office inspector was coming to inspect the post office, so the man who aspired to hold that office slipped into the post office and tacked under the delivery window a picture of the distinguished colored Member of the House of Representatives from Chicago, Mr. de Priest. Then the post office inspector looked in, and said, "Why do you put this up in the post office?"

The postmaster replied, "I did not put it up; I don't know anything about it."

The inspector said, "Oh, yes, you do; and you have been engaging in pernicious political activity."

The postmaster appealed to the Civil Service Commission. The Commission investigated his activity, and held that he was engaged in pernicious political activity, removed him from office, and put in that office a good Republican who would not violate the civil-service law.

Mr. TYDINGS and Mr. LANGER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona has the floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arizona will yield to me for a minute, I should like to suggest to the distinguished Senator from Ohio, who I know is always fair and wants to take a broad-gage view of the situation, that we have here a stronger bill than the one passed by the House. We have a bill which only seeks to do justice in cases involving minor infractions, such as when a civil-service employee, unwittingly perhaps, steps over the line a little bit, and engages in a local election. Certainly in Virginia and Maryland, if more than 10 percent of the locality is comprised of civil-service employees, are we to disfranchise them completely with respect to their local elections? That is all the amendment seeks to accomplish. The amendment comes from a bipartisan committee, with a unanimous recommendation that it be adopted.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I yield the floor back to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield first to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I understand the distinguished Senator from Maryland wishes to catch a train, and I therefore yield to him first.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator. I simply want to make the observation that Montgomery County, Md., in which county Silver Spring, Bethesda, and Chevy Chase are located, does not elect Democrats all the time. The present State senator from Montgomery County is a Republican. Many of the offices have been held by Republicans. The county went about eight or ten thousand for Mr. Dewey in the last Presidential election. There is absolutely no desire on my part or on the part of the Senator from Virginia to make this a partisan matter.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield at that point, I may say the Republican leaders of both Montgomery County and Arlington County endorsed the pending bill.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to point out that the present government of Montgomery County is nonpartisan. The Democratic organization of the county, and some elements of the Republican organization, fought the present charter form of government there, and the independent citizens voted it in. Therefore, I think the Senator from Maryland is fully within the facts when he says that there cannot be in the great area around Washington any partisan advantage to either party. The amendment is simply designed to give American citizens the right to participate in local elections where the 10-percent factor is present. At present many of our best citizens are precluded from taking part in political campaigns and the cause of good local government suffers by it. In the case of Montgomery County, which contains the second largest city in Maryland, the elections are frequently Republican, and in national elections they are almost always Republican. Therefore, when we ask for this bit of justice for the people who live in that area, I hope no one will consider it is for purely partisan purposes. It is in the interest of good citizenship, nothing more and nothing less; and it is only for the local offices, with respect to which civil-service employees ought to have the right to assert their voice and influence, in the interest of good government.

Mr. HAYDEN. I now yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. I wonder whether the distinguished Senator from Arizona is aware of the fact that after Senator Hatch wrote the letter in 1945 to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], who was then chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the Senator from Nevada had the staff study the question, and a bill was prepared; and that when it came before the committee, Senator Hatch himself voted against the bill. The bill was very similar to the one now before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Washington, who is the author of the bill.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I do not know what Senator Hatch did in the Committee on the Judiciary. I can only corroborate the letter that has been written to the distinguished chairman, the Senator from Arizona. The bill was introduced in 1945, and subsequently became a committee bill. It did not involve any particular case in the State of Washington. A distinguished Member of the House of Representatives called my attention to two cases in the State of Massachusetts involving technical violations and injustice, because the employees involved had to be removed. He asked me whether I did not think this law ought to be amended so as to allow some flexibility in the matter of punishment, and whether I would not speak to the Senator from New Mexico about the matter.

I spoke to the Senator from New Mexico, calling his attention to this particular case. He made some investigation. He came to me on many occasions afterward, saying informally, "I think the original provisions of the law are too drastic, and therefore I should be glad to endorse such a bill." I introduced a bill, and the Senator from New Mexico, on many occasions, publicly and privately endorsed it, as he does now in his letter addressed to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Is it not true that in 1945 and 1946 Senator Hatch was a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and, of course, attended the meetings, and that when the bill which was drawn up was before the committee, the Senator from New Mexico himself voted against it?

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not have access to the records of the committee. I should be very curious to find a yea-and-nay vote in the committee to that effect.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. Did I correctly understand the Senator to indicate that he thinks the bill is improved by the provision inserted by the Senate committee, namely, that in order that a lesser penalty may be imposed, the United States Civil Service Commission must by unanimous vote find that the violation does not warrant removal?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. DONNELL. Does the Senator regard the provision which has been inserted by the Senate committee, requiring a unanimous vote on the part of the Civil Service Commission in order to make the lesser penalty become effective, quite an important addition made by the Senate committee?

Mr. HAYDEN. I think so. I think it is important, and that the provision should be worded in exactly that way.

Mr. DONNELL. I should like further to ask the Senator whether he thinks its importance is somewhat diminished by the fact that, under the Federal law, while the President is authorized to appoint three persons, not more than two of whom shall be adherents of the same party, the President may remove any commissioner? I amplify the question by asking the Senator whether, in view of the fact that each of the commissioners receives a salary of $10,000 per annum, and that the President has absolute power without any requirement, so far as I can find, that the removal must be for cause, he does not think that the zeal of the minority member of the Civil Service Commission to insist that the offense should involve the maximum penalty, would be somewhat diminished by the fact that if he so votes, that is, if he votes for the maximum penalty being retained, he is subject to instant dismissal by the President without cause?

Mr. HAYDEN. Let me ask the Senator, has he ever known of a President who has removed a member of the Civil Service Commission? It has never been done so far as I know.

Mr. DONNELL. I may say to the Senator, I do not know the history of that, but it appears to me that this particular insertion by the Senate committee, that is to say that the Commission can act only by unanimous vote, is not by any manner of means a guaranty that the Civil Service Commission will exercise a wise discretion in the matter, when the President, if one member should not concur, has the authority to remove that member of the Commission.

Mr. HAYDEN. That recommendation was made by a subcommittee which I, as chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration, appointed. The subcommittee consisted of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], and the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND]. They conducted hearings on the bill, and the President of the Civil Service Commission and the Special Assistant to the Commissioner appeared, along with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY]. The subcommittee then held a second hearing, at which time there was considered the second section of the bill, which relates to political activities of residents of communities in the vicinity of Washington, where 10 percent or more of the voters are Federal employees. The bill was favorably reported to the main committee. My recollection is there was some further amendment made in the committee, and that it was then reported to the Senate without opposition.

The bill has been on the calendar for a long time. I am satisfied that some of those who have looked at it believe, simply because the Hatch Act is mentioned, that there must be something of political significance in connection with the bill, and therefore that it should not pass. However, if Senators will examine its terms, as it stands, it seems to me they will agree with me it is a perfectly reasonable regulation.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for an observation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. First, I want to call attention to the harshness of the penalty. Let us assume a man is 55 years of age, and that he is making $5,000 a year; he commits a minor infraction of the rule; he is dismissed. At the age of 55 he cannot get employment in industry anywhere. He has been in the Government all his life. It is equivalent to imposing upon him a penalty of $50,000 because of a minor infraction of an election restriction.

Now, so far as giving Democrats favors, I may say to my distinguished friend from Missouri that I have had 17 years' experience with the Civil Service Commission. I do not know the membership; but never, in 17 years, have I been able to get a single favor of any kind from them. I shall refer to one incident. The Commission insisted on disqualifying a postmaster whose appointment I had recommended. He was a past postmaster, and he had been approved. He automatically moved up to a third-class postmastership. The Commission went back and dug up evidence of things they claimed happened when he was a fourth-class postmaster, and said, "We will not approve him to be a third-class postmaster." I tried for over a year to get them to do what I thought was merely simple justice to the man, but they would not do it. What happened? The Congress passed a law to take care of his situation by providing that when a man has been a fourth-class postmaster and has been approved by the Civil Service Commission, and the receipts of his office increase, so that he would automatically be confirmed as a third-class postmaster, the Civil Service Commission cannot kick him out in the second round. In that particular case the Civil Service Commission absolutely would not confirm that man, although, on the same evidence, they had previously confirmed him.

Any Senator who thinks the Civil Service Commission will not enforce the law should wait until his party comes into power and see how many favors he will receive from the Commission. I have never received a favor, from a strictly party standpoint, from the Civil Service Commission in 17 years.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that practically every postmaster in the country today, under the civil service, is a Democrat. Is it not inevitable, under the law, that whichever party is in control tends to acquire all the positions?

Mr. HAYDEN. There are at this time Republican postmasters in many States. The difficulty from the political angle is that where there is a choice under the civil-service laws, going back to the time of the late President Harding, any applicant among the top three on the list could be considered and appointed. The late President Wilson placed all postmasters under the civil service, and the high man had to be selected. President Harding changed that, and since that time there has been a rule that anyone among the top three could be selected. If the Democrats were in power, the man selected would be a Democrat, and if the Republicans were in power, the man selected would be a Republican.

Mr. TAFT. Have there not been cases of applicants failing to qualify and Civil Service Commission ordering and holding another examination?

Mr. HAYDEN. There have been instances of that kind; but what has that to do with a minor infraction of the law, such as that of an employee who without adequate knowledge of the drastic penalty that might be imposed upon him, circulates a nominating petition, or is guilty of some other minor act of that kind? If he does that, out he goes, and the Civil Service Commission has no discretion whatever.

Mr. TAFT. My question has this bearing. I do not think the Civil Service Commission is the proper body to determine the question. The bill provides that the United States Civil Service Commission has to find that such violation warrants removal. The law provided originally that a violator should be removed. I think that what will happen will be that the Civil Service Commission will say, "There is no offense warranting removal," and it will assume in every case to determine the exact penalty to impose. I think that would entirely kill the remedy of removal.

So far as a 30- or 60-day suspension is concerned, the violator will be paid by the political party for which he is working. He has nothing to lose. Once the Commission has taken the position that it does not think the violation warrants removal, it will take that position as to all offenses.

Mr. HAYDEN. This bill does not change the law in that respect. It merely changes the penalty to be imposed under the law.

Mr. TAFT. I suggest that if we want to substitute another penalty it should be a penalty to be imposed by a court, such as a fine or imprisonment. It should not be left to the discretion of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Does the Senator mean to say that a violator should be put in jail for a minor violation?

Mr. TAFT. Not for a minor violation; but if there are other unlawful acts I think there should be the usual form of penalty, so the offenders can be prosecuted in court and so that the court can impose whatever penalty it may think is fair. I am willing to leave such judgment to a court, but not to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Here is another example which is in the unanimous report of the committee:

An outstanding example noted was that of a young girl, a minor, employed in a Midwest post office. Her father, a friend of a candidate for political office, asked her to distribute some 20 cards for this candidate. She asked the postmaster, her superior, whether it was proper for her to do so. He informed her that there would be no objection so long as she did not distribute them in the post office. Relying on this statement, and with no intention to violate the Hatch Act, a law of which she had no detailed knowledge, she distributed the cards. A complaint was made to the Civil Service Commission that by this action she had violated the Hatch Act. After investigation, the penalty imposed, as required by section 9 (b), she had to be removed from her position.

It seems to me that when cases such as that occur, there should be some flexibility. A young girl such as that could not go to court. It would cost a great amount of money. She would have to employ lawyers. She would be subject, as the Senator from Ohio suggests, to a fine, or possibly she would be sent to jail. I do not know whether the girl was a Republican or a Democrat, but, under the Civil Service Commission, which has jurisdiction over civil-service employees, she could, by merely writing a letter, have her case reviewed. I think that is only fair to employees who, in many cases, are in technical violation because they do not understand the act, and in some cases they feel that the law is a violation of their constitutional rights.

In my State there is a town called Richland, with approximately 25,000 inhabitants. Of the 25,000 persons in that town, 20,000 are Federal employees. They would like to be incorporated as a township, because they want to reside there permanently. They want to pay taxes and to be a part of the State of Washington. If this bill should be enacted into law any of them could run for office. Under the present conditions it would be a violation of the Hatch Act and any violator could be sent to jail or fined.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to bring up for discussion and opinion the second section of the bill, which has not yet been discussed. As I understand, it would permit a Federal employee not only to take part in a political campaign in a locality, but to become a candidate for office. That is going much further than the present Hatch Act. Section 1 of the Hatch Act allows a Federal employee to take part in political campaigns wherever the United States Civil Service Commission permits it. It substantially provides that it is not lawful for Federal employees, with a few specific exceptions, to take part in a campaign. By this bill we would allow a person to become a candidate for a local office. If such a person is permitted to become a candidate for a local office, what about towns in the western part of the country, where atomic energy is now being manufactured and where almost everyone in the town is a Federal employee?

Mr. HAYDEN. Would the Senator say that in a town where practically all the inhabitants are Federal employees none of them should participate in the city government?

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I do not object to their taking part in politics, but if they are to become candidates themselves, would it not completely change the whole principle of the law?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I should like to reply to the Senator from Massachusetts.

As I understand the situation, under the present law, as shown on page 4 of the committee report, the Commission has discretion to permit Federal employees, if they are not candidates on a Republican or Democratic ticket, to become active in local affairs. These questions were raised in a letter from a lady in Arlington, Va.:

"1. May Federal employees subject to the Hatch Act become members of political groups, irrespective of the name used, which nominate or endorse candidates and actively participate therein to any greater extent than a Government employee may participate in the affairs of the recognized political parties or the clubs of such political parties?"

No such Federal employees are permitted to participate in the affairs of State or National political parties or in the management of clubs of such parties beyond mere membership. Under the privileges of section 16 of the Hatch Act such employees may become members of a local group not affiliated with a State or National political party even though such group may sponsor or endorse independent candidates for local office. Further, any Federal employee subject to the Hatch Act may become a candidate for local Arlington County office provided that he runs as an independent candidate and does not seek endorsement by one of the State or National political parties.

As I understand the situation, in the counties adjoining Washington, if a person runs for office as an independent candidate, it is perfectly proper, but if he is a candidate on either the Democratic or Republican ticket, it is illegal. It seems to me that either such a person should not be permitted to be an employee at all or should not be permitted to hold any political office whatsoever, and the discretion Congress has given the Commission heretofore should be revoked, or it should be expanded as provided in the pending bill.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the Senator agree with me that as a result of what the Civil Service Commission holds with respect to permitting civil-service employees to run on an independent ticket, they are destroying to some extent the two-party system, which we on this side of the aisle and those on the other side of the aisle are constantly saying should be maintained? I have heard that said by both Democrats and Republicans. But as a result of the Civil Service Commission's ruling civil-service employees are encouraged to go into different kinds of independent parties. In other words, "splinter" parties are encouraged as a result of the Civil Service Commission's ruling, and the proposed amendment of the law would take care of that.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is correct in that respect.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arizona will yield, I believe I can give some information requested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL].

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I wish to call to the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts the fact that the 10-percent provision is restricted to Virginia and Maryland. I framed an amendment with the 10-percent provision, but after the subcommittee considered places like Oak Ridge, where the workers are all Government employees, and where the activity is run by an employee commission, subject to some little participation, nonpartisan, they thought that the provision should be restricted to where two known situations existed.

I do not know what percentage of the citizens in Arlington County are Government employees, but it may be 20 or 30 percent. If one of the Government employees runs for a full-time position, of course he is out of his Government position. When I say, full-time position, I refer to such offices as county treasurer or county clerk. The counties like to get the benefit of first-class people for the school boards and for county boards, and they are the positions for which the Government employees run.

Strange to say, the Civil Service Commission has ruled, as the Senator from Arizona has said, that if such a person does not call himself a Republican or does not call himself a Democrat, but says, "I am an independent," it is all right, that is pro bono publico. The Commission says, "Go ahead and do what you please." So in Arlington County enough of them got together and called themselves independents to take charge and fill the places on the county board. Now they want to take charge and fill all the places in the county, not by Republicans, not by Democrats, but by hybrids who call themselves independents. They have the blessing of the Civil Service Commission.

I, myself, believe in the two-party system. Of course, I would not prohibit the existence of other parties, but I find that the responsibility imposed on a party in charge has been a great blessing to our Nation, especially when I have had the privilege of going to Europe and finding that so many countries there cannot have a stable government because they do not have the two-party system. I think that in France there are more than 30 parties. I do not know how many parties there are in Italy. But many of the small countries of Europe have as many as 5 or 10 or 15 parties, and the government, if it is to be at all stable—and none of them are very stable—has to be a coalition government. In some of those countries Communists have to be taken into the government. There are in the Parliament of France, mind you, 182 Communists who, when they once get in, worm themselves into key positions, and learn all the Government secrets. It has been a bad thing for those countries, and I hope we can avoid that here. I should like to see in charge of running our Government, and responsible for it, either Democrats or Republicans, one or the other. I think it has been a great thing through the years that we have adhered to the two-party system.

This bill is designed to turn back an entering wedge that has been thrust forward by an illogical ruling of the Civil Service Commission, so that if a civil-service employee calling himself a member of one of the established parties takes part in politics, he is to be held as engaging in pernicious political activity, but if he says, "I have no affiliation, I am an independent," he can do what he pleases.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. Along the line of the questions I asked the Senator a few minutes ago, as I understand, when this bill came from the House it provided that if the United States Civil Service Commission finds that a violation does not warrant removal, a lesser penalty may be imposed by direction of the Commission. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. DONNELL. That would have left the determination of that question to the majority vote of the Commission.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. DONNELL. Am I correct in understanding that the Committee on Rules and Administration felt that it would be a mistake to leave it to a majority vote of the Commission, because a majority might be motivated by partisan considerations, and so act. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. HAYDEN. It is my understanding, that the committee desired to make sure that no case would be acted upon unless all the members of the Commission were agreeable. They think that would be a greater safeguard against any undue or precipitate action.

Mr. DONNELL. Am I correct in understanding that therefore, in order to insure against decisions that violations shall not warrant removal being made on a partisan basis, it was provided by the Senate committee that unanimous action of the Commission would be essential to find that such a violation did not warrant removal?

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes; and the same provision is made with respect to the restoration to office of those who had been removed on trivial charges.

Mr. DONNELL. If I may ask the Senator another question, I assume he agrees with the sentiments expressed on page 2 of the report, which reads, "The provision for a unanimous vote of the members of the Commission will in the opinion of the committee preclude possibility of political considerations entering into the penalties determined upon by the Commission." Does the Senator agree with that statement?

Mr. HAYDEN. That was the opinion of the committee.

Mr. DONNELL. To take a concrete case, suppose a series of facts was presented to the Commission, and the majority of the Commission should say, "This does not warrant removal. It is a minor matter, and we think it does not warrant removal." Does not the Senator think, first, that the minority member of the Commission would be very apt to be largely influenced by his constant association with the majority of the Commission, and thereby might very readily be induced to vote with the majority? Does not the Senator further think that the minority member of the Commission would be apt to be somewhat alarmed, if he should disagree in a series of cases, at any rate, with the majority, by reason of the fact that under the statute the President has absolute authority to remove any member of the Commission, as I understand, with or without cause, from the $10,000 position which the member holds? Therefore, would not the minority member be very reluctant, first, because of his association with the majority members over a period of time, and, second, because of the possibility of risking his very important and lucrative position, to put his own judgment against that of the majority, if there were any basis for debate in the matter at all?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I cannot concede that that would be the case, for the reason that the Senator's assumption is that the Commissioner holding the minority position is so anxious to hang on to his job that he will not exercise the judgment and discretion imposed upon him by law.

As for the Commission, I have never favored it. I have always favored a single executive authority, because, as I am sure the Senator found when he was Governor of Missouri, whenever a commission of three is established, there is always one who does not get along with the other two and who stands up for what he thinks is right. There is more confusion and discussion and disagreement in a commission than there can possibly be where there is one executive, when one man can render a decision. I do not think men in offices of that kind would yield their honest judgment in a case. I do not believe it.

Mr. DONNELL. Does not the Senator think that this sentence I quoted from the report, namely: "The provision for a unanimous vote of the members of the Commission will, in the opinion of the committee, preclude the possibility of political considerations entering into the penalties determined upon by the Commission" is something strong, and perhaps exaggerates the absolute insurance the provision inserted by the Senate committee would bring about?

Mr. HAYDEN. It certainly does convey the impression, however, that where there is a Commission consisting of two members of one political party and a third of another political party, sitting as members of the Commission representing their parties, they might act in a partisan manner if the two of them who were in the majority could control; whereas if three were required, the liability of partisan action would certainly be reduced.

Mr. DONNELL. But the Senator does not think, does he, that, to quote the language of the report, "the provision for a unanimous vote" will preclude possibility of political considerations entering into the penalty?

Mr. HAYDEN. "Possibility" is a very large word, of course.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. As I understand the amendment, it deals only with minor offenses of Federal employees, and not with major offenses.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator is mistaken. It is entirely possible for a Senator to imagine that the Commission would not apply the law to minor cases, but he might imagine that in certain instances they might use it in a minor case, and if he lets his imagination run wild enough, he could conceive any sort of circumstances.

Mr. LUCAS. I agree with the Senator on that point. If he fires his imagination to the extent the Senator has indicated, he could make a major case out of a minor case. The real purpose of the amendment, as I understand, is to take care of the minor infractions.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. I wish to make one observation because of what the distinguished Senator has been saying. To me it is most fantastic to think that the great and distinguished Senator from Missouri would lean upon such a weak reed, as is indicated when he says that he is afraid that a member of the Civil Service Commission, appointed by the President of the United States, will not do his duty for fear the President of the United States might remove him because of the action taken by him in the case of one of these minor infractions.

It is simply absurd and ridiculous to think that anyone could believe such a thing. If a Senator does not have more confidence in that part of the executive branch of the Government than the Senator from Missouri has, then, Mr. President, in the opinion of the Senator from Illinois, we are moving far down the stream. I am surprised at what the Senator from Missouri says.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. Unfortunately, I have an important engagement to lunch with an official of the Government with whom I am going to discuss some official business. I hope the Senator from Arizona, who is in charge of the bill, will suggest the absence of a quorum, so Senators can get to the Chamber and register their opinions on the bill. Before I leave, to be absent for about 40 minutes, I should like to suggest that I have been sitting here trying to figure out how I could further purify the political situation in this country. I am sorry the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] is not present because I know he stands for pure government, as we all do, and certainly as the Senator from Missouri does. I am thinking about offering the following amendment:

Add to section 16 of the Hatch Act the following:

"No corporation, any officer of which contributes to the political campaign fund of a candidate for Federal office or to a political party campaign fund, shall for a period of 5 years thereafter be eligible to bid for, negotiate for, or receive any contract with the Federal Government."

I think an amendment such as that might do a great deal more good than inflicting what the Constitution itself prohibits, which is cruel and inhuman punishment upon an ordinary citizen who is working for $2,000 or $2,500 for the Federal Government, and who, by reason of the fact that he distributes 20 cards advocating a friend's election, shall be forever barred from service to the Federal Government. I say it is time to look at this matter realistically.

We do not say to our judges, "You must put everyone in jail for 5 years who, while working in the post office, takes a $5 post-office money order. Yes; it is true a person guilty of such an offense can be put in jail for 5 years. Some persons who have done such things have been put in jail for considerable terms. On the other hand, I point out that we also trust our Federal judges. We trust them to say, "Well, John took $5 worth of money orders out of the till, but he had a wife who was sick with cancer, and he had two kids who needed shoes. He should not have done what he did, but I am not going to send him to jail."

Yet we say to the Civil Service Commission that a Federal employee cannot hand to his friends cards advocating support of a friend for office. We heard cited the case of a post-office employee who had been working in the post office for some 25 years, who was within 2 years of his retirement. What was his great offense? A friend of his, a close friend, had been working alongside of him and had retired about 6 months before. The retired man became interested in politics. The man who retired stood for office, and his friend had some nominating petitions signed in behalf of the candidate. In spite of the fact that the testimony showed he had been a loyal Government worker, that he had rendered excellent service to the Federal Government, and although he was within 2 years of retirement, he was discharged. The Commission said they regretted it, but that under the law they could do nothing else.

It seems to me we would be using good judgment to pass the bill which has been reported by the committee, with the amendments suggested to it, a bill which was passed unanimously by the House without a yea-and-nay vote and without a single objection having been made to it.

I should like to know from the Senator from Missouri, and perhaps the request may also come to the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], whether he will join me in sponsoring the suggested amendment I just read.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield for a further question?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. The Senator doubtless heard the expression of surprise uttered by the Senator from Illinois at the position taken by the Senator from Missouri. The Senator from Illinois in substance said that because of some trifling, minor infractions, and some rulings that will be called forth by reason of them, there is no danger that the minority member of the Commission will be fearful of losing his job. I ask the Senator from Arizona whether it is not a fact, as I understood the Senator from Arizona to say to the Senator from Illinois, that the amendment proposed by the committee is not limited to minor matters but, as the Senator from Arizona has said, it is conceivable that it could apply to any matters, and that it is merely left to the determination of the Commission as to whether the specific violation is or is not one which warrants removal.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think the discretion is in the Commission, just as it is in a judge on the bench, to pass on the case upon its merits. If there is a deliberate violation of the law, certainly the full penalty should be imposed. If a Federal employee, knowing the law and knowing the regulations, deliberately engages in political activity, he should be removed from office, and a Civil Service Commission of any account at all would remove him.

Upon the other hand, in a minor case of the kind referred to in the committee report—and cases vary in degree—the Commission is given discretion, either as a minimum penalty to say that the girl in question, who was guilty of a minor infraction, shall lose 15 days' pay as a warning, which would have been entirely proper in the case of the little girl who distributed a few cards, or in the case of other minor infractions to lay off an individual for 6 months or a year, or whatever the time considered to be justified, according to the nature of the offense.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. DONNELL. However, the section proposed by the Senate committee, the one to which we are now addressing ourselves, is not confined by its terms to minor infractions, is it? It provides that—

> If the Commission by unanimous vote finds that the violation does not warrant removal, a lesser penalty shall be imposed by direction of the Commission.

This provision does not say that it is limited in its operations to minor infractions, but leaves it to the Commission to determine whether or not the infraction is minor.

Mr. HAYDEN. Exactly as a judge on the bench determines whether or not the person before him for sentence is a real villain, who deliberately committed a heinous crime and should be severely punished, or one who has merely gone astray for a little while, and should have a suspended sentence.

Mr. DONNELL. Did not the committee itself, by inserting the language "by unanimous vote," requiring that the Commission must make such a finding in the case of minor infraction by unanimous vote, recognize that there was at least some basis for fear that if it were left to a majority vote the matter would be determined on the basis of political considerations? Is it not true, therefore, that the committee took the view, as I quoted from the report:

> The provision for a unanimous vote of the members of the Commission will in the opinion of the committee preclude possibility of political considerations entering into the penalties determined upon by the Commission.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator will agree with me, I am sure, that it does reduce the possibilities of political considerations.

Mr. DONNELL. I think it reduces them, but, if I may say so, it still leaves it subject to possibilities. One is that when a closely associated Commission is working along year after year, two members of one party and one of the other, it is easily possible that those men may become very much in the same groove, and regard things very much along the same line, and that when the majority members decide one way the minority member may, particularly if he is not a very strong personality, yield to the other two. I think it is probable that in a series of cases which might come before the Commission, not necessarily matters the minority member believes to be minor infractions, but in a series of cases that come before the Commission, the minority member is very apt to think twice, and with great reluctance, before he votes against the majority members, when he is subject not only to their displeasure and to the discomfort of working with them, but is subject under the law to immediate dismissal by the President from a $10,000-a-year position.

Mr. HAYDEN. My experience in dealing with commissions is that there is no hesitancy on the part of a minority member to disagree with the majority. There are more rows and troubles on commissions than can possibly occur under any other system.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I now yield to the Senator from California, who was on the subcommittee which reported the bill.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I should like to make this contribution to the discussion today: I am no longer a member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, but was at the time this measure was before that committee during the last session of Congress, and I served as a member of the subcommittee which heard the testimony in regard to this matter. If my recollection serves me correctly, it was the junior Senator from California who suggested the amendment requiring unanimous vote of the Civil Service Commission so that there would not be, at least, much danger of a purely partisan decision. I think the point raised by the Senator from Missouri that it does not eliminate the possibility of a purely partisan decision, is well taken, although I think it greatly lessens the possibility of such a decision.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. The Senator, then, thinks that this statement in the report is a little bit strong, does he not?—

> The provision for a unanimous vote of the members of the Commission will in the opinion of the committee preclude possibility of political considerations entering into the penalties determined upon by the Commission.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Yes, I think the Senator's point is well taken on that. I do not believe it precludes it, but I think it lessens the likelihood of it.

Mr. DONNELL. I agree with that.

Mr. KNOWLAND. In hearing the testimony, it seemed to the Senator from California, who was a member of the subcommittee, that there are a number of these cases which are of a minor nature, and that removal and barring from office was rather an extreme penalty in view of the character of the offense. I did not eliminate from consideration, of course, the danger of opening the barn door and letting all the horses out.

Nevertheless, I felt that with the Commission charged by the Congress and the country with the enforcement of the law, the Commission would not abuse the discretionary power which would be vested in it by the bill as proposed to be amended.

It was also my feeling that even in the case of minor infractions, there should be some penalty. That is why the amendment provides for a 15-day suspension.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOEY in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I should like to ask the Senator a question which I was going to ask the Senator from Arizona. All of us know that in criminal law some penalties, because of the nature of the case, are made very severe, with no discretion vested in the court to lessen them. Such a situation applies in cases of murder, for instance.

But in this case, the amendment proposed by the committee would have us go from one extreme to the other; it would leave in the law the severe penalty, but would provide a minimum requirement. All of us know that in court cases, if a good case is made, the minimum penalty generally is imposed.

I wonder whether in this case, if there is to be any minimum—and we feel that a minimum of 15 days' suspension is a very low one—would it not be better to increase the minimum to, let us say, 30 days or 45 days?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Of course, I cannot speak for the committee, because the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] is handling the bill on the floor. But personally I feel that the point the Senator from Massachusetts has made is well taken. If the minimum were increased from 15 days to 30 days, I think it would put all Federal employees on notice that they should not violate the law, because the penalty would be a little stiffer; but at the same time we would remove what seems to me to be an inequitable situation, namely, forever barring such employees from holding Federal office.

Were I in charge of the bill, I would accept such a suggestion, namely, to increase the minimum from a 15-day suspension to a 30-day suspension.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will offer such a modification of the amendment, I will accept it.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, is such an amendment now in order to be offered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the motion of the Senator from Washington is the pending question; amendments are not now in order to the bill.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. When it is proper to offer such an amendment, I shall do so. The purpose is to increase the minimum penalty from suspension of 15 days to suspension for 30 days.

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall accept that as a modification of the amendment, Mr. President, on behalf of the committee.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has raised a point with regard to the participation of Federal employees in local elections. I should like to attempt to clear his mind, if possible, as well as that of the Senate as a whole.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. The point I raised was presented in the form of a question.

Mr. BYRD. I understand.

Mr. President, when the Hatch Act was first passed, the Senator from Virginia offered an amendment to give to the Civil Service Commission the right to promulgate rules and regulations so that in counties having a large proportion of Federal employees, such Federal employees, under conditions established by the Civil Service Commission, could participate in local elections. I think that is a matter which is of supreme importance, because, for example, in Arlington and Fairfax Counties, Va., and in Montgomery County, Md., there are communities in which perhaps a majority of the residents are employees of the Federal Government. They are not Virginians or Marylanders primarily, in many cases; many of them come from various other sections of the United States, and are located in those counties because of their proximity to Washington. There is not sufficient room in the city of Washington for those Federal employees; there is not sufficient housing in Washington for them.

When the Senator from Virginia offered that amendment, as appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 86, part 3, page 2976, the Senator from Virginia said:

> Mr. President, in certain areas of the country, and especially adjacent to Washington, a majority of the residents of certain towns and counties are employees of the Federal Government. My amendment is for the purpose of giving the Civil Service Commission the authority to permit a Federal employee to take part in purely local elections when it is considered in the interest of the public welfare to do so.

I was referring, of course, to the election of school trustees and other elections purely of local interest.

I further said at that time:

> If that is not done, Mr. President, those Federal employees will be denied the right even to hold a nonprofit office, such as member of the school board or member of the town council; and, in my judgment, serious injury to the cause of good government will be done unless those Federal employees are permitted, under regulations adopted by the Civil Service Commission, to take part in purely local affairs.

Senator Hatch accepted that amendment. He said:

> Inasmuch as the amendment which the Senator now offers merely restores to the Civil Service Commission the power it had, and which it exercised before the passage of the act last year, I thought perhaps it was wise to give general authority to meet local or domestic situations—

And so forth. For the information of the Senator from Massachusetts, let me say that the Civil Service Commission made the ruling under discussion. I think that ruling was entirely out of line and did not deal properly with the situation at all. It permitted Federal employees to become candidates on nonpartisan nominations and in nonpartisan elections. In Arlington County, for example, what are called town meetings are held, and at those meetings certain nominees are selected; and they are opposed by the regular Democratic nominees and the regular Republican nominees. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Washington Star of June 5, 1949, which refers to a Miss Martin, who is employed by the Bureau of the Budget as an economist. The article states that she became a candidate for the Arlington County Board, at a town meeting. However, she could not become a candidate for that position as a Democrat or as a Republican. But under the Civil Service Commission's regulations she could become a candidate of some nonpartisan organization.

I think that situation is destructive of the method by which we conduct our Government, which is carried on largely through the regular parties. However, under its present ruling, the Civil Service Commission does not permit any Government employee to become a candidate of any of the regular political parties; but if such Federal employees run for office as independents, they can participate in elections, can run for office, can speak in election campaigns, can serve in office, and so forth.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I simply wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the same kind of condition exists in some of the towns where Government plants, some of them wartime plants, recently have been established. For instance, let me refer to Oak Ridge, Tenn. I am informed that approximately 75 or 80 percent of the people living there are nonresidents of Tennessee who came there to work, coming there from various other parts of the United States. Quite a little city has grown up at Oak Ridge. However, instead of the residents of that city having anything to do with their local government, through local elections, the situation is that under the leadership of that great statesman and purist, Mr. Mr. Lilienthal, a New York corporation has been given the duty of governing the city. The Federal Government employees who live there have nothing to do with running that city, though most of the residents of the city are employees of the Federal Government. A New York corporation conducts all the city's public affairs. That is something very unusual, Mr. President. It should not exist in this free country.

So I hope very much this bill will pass. It should pass. The Hatch Act should be amended so as to allow local self-government, even if the persons engaging in the local government are Federal employees. Service as a Federal employee does not make a miscreant of a man. After all, several of us are Federal employees. We should not adopt a rule of that sort, it seems to me.

So, Mr. President, I say that this bill, which has been carefully studied by the committee and has been reported by it to the Senate, should be passed, and should be passed at once.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I did not realize from reading the act that, under it, Federal employees are permitted to be independent candidates. If that is so, the act should be amended so as to permit all Federal employees to be candidates for local office.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, many of the Federal Government employees in the counties I have mentioned are splendid citizens and have lived in those sections for years and years. However, at the present time they cannot even take part in an election of a school trustee, unless they are nonpartisan. Why the Civil Service Commission should make such a ruling, I am unable to understand, because the purpose of the amendment which I offered to the bill in the Seventy-sixth Congress was to permit Federal Government employees to participate in elections for purely local offices, such as school trustees and other offices having to do with the education or welfare of the children of the communities, and so forth. However, the Civil Service Commission has said that Federal employees cannot become candidates for such offices if they run on the regular party tickets—either Democratic or Republican—but can do so if they run on an independent ticket. That is the situation now existing in the counties surrounding Washington. In those counties, under the Commission's ruling, if Federal Government employees are to be candidates for local office, they must do so as nonpartisan candidates, but must not follow the usual procedure of alining themselves with some established party.

So, Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be adopted. There is nothing political about it. In a political sense, from my standpoint, I feel I would not gain anything by the adoption of the amendment. But I believe the citizens in the localities to which I have referred, who are connected with the Federal Government, have a right to take part in purely local affairs, and to do so without having their jobs taken away from them or without being penalized by fines, and so forth.

So I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the parliamentary situation is, as I understand, that the bill has been made the unfinished business of the Senate, but that a motion is pending to displace it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question before the Senate is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3905) to amend section 3121 of the Internal Revenue Code, Calendar No. 644.

Mr. HAYDEN. Must that motion be disposed of, before this bill can be proceeded with?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY IN THE FAR EAST

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I have certain documents I should like to place in the RECORD. Apropos of the reports released yesterday on the summary of the Wallace report on China, I wish to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point a copy of a letter which I addressed to the Secretary of State under date of April 19, 1948, as follows:

APRIL 19, 1948.

Hon. ROBERT A. LOVETT,
Acting Secretary of State,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, which will soon be taking up the European and China relief bill, I would like to have a copy of the Wallace report on China made by Mr. Henry Wallace to President Roosevelt in 1944.

With best personal regards, I remain,
Sincerely yours,
WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senator.

I also wish to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point a copy of a letter which I wrote on the same date to the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who was then chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, telling him that I had written to the Secretary of State; a copy of the Senator's reply to me; and a copy of the letter I received under date of April 24 from Mr. Robert A. Lovett, Acting Secretary of State.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

APRIL 19, 1948.

Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Enclosed is a copy of a letter that I have today written to Mr. Robert Lovett, Acting Secretary of State, requesting a copy of the Wallace Report on China issued in 1944.

It seems to me that the time has come when constructive action by the Congress of the United States depends upon members of the Foreign Relations and Appropriations Committees of the Senate having access to information which is the basis of certain policies we are following in Europe and the Far East. In a short while the appropriation bill for European and China aid will be before the Appropriations Committee.

I hope you may be able to use your good offices to get the report in question released for the information of the Members of the Senate.

With best personal regards, I remain,
Sincerely yours,
WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senator.

UNITED STATES SENATE, COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
April 20, 1948.

Hon. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Thanks for your note of April 19.

I shall be glad to urge Secretary Lovett to release the China report you request. I think I understand the significance of your suggestion.

With warm personal regards and best wishes,
Cordially and faithfully,
A. H. VANDENBERG.

APRIL 24, 1948.

The Honorable WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR KNOWLAND: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of April 19, 1948, in which you request a copy of the Wallace Report on China made by Mr. Henry Wallace to President Roosevelt in 1944.

A thorough search of the records of this Department has failed to reveal the existence of a Wallace Report on China. As you will recall, in the early summer of 1944 Mr. Wallace, who was then Vice President, visited China at the behest and as the personal representative of the President. It seems that Mr. Wallace reported directly to President Roosevelt. In any event, the Department of State is not aware of any report prepared by Mr. Wallace.

Very sincerely yours,
ROBERT A. LOVETT,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, I also wish to call the attention of the Senate to the footnote on page 549 of the so-called white paper entitled "United States Relations with China," which footnote reads as follows:

The files of the Department do not contain any indication of the existence of a report in written form made by Mr. Wallace to President Roosevelt or of the nature of any oral report made.

I also wish to have printed as a part of my remarks, and following the statements I have just made, the text of the summary of the Wallace Report as released yesterday by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], who had received it from Mr. Wallace, and merely to observe that it is a very strange thing that in dealing with our foreign policy, an important matter in the Far East, the right hand of the Government apparently did not know what the left hand was doing.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Our first stop in China was at Tihua (Urumchi), capital of Sinkiang Province. The Governor, Gen. Sheng Shih-tsai, is a typical war lord. The government is personal and carried out by thorough police surveillance. Ninety percent of the population is non-Chinese, mostly Uighur (Turki). Tension between Chinese and non-Chinese is growing with little or no evidence of ability to deal effectively with the problem. General Sheng, 2 years ago pro-Soviet, is now anti-Soviet, making life extremely difficult for the Soviet consul general and Soviet citizens in Sinkiang.

There seems little reason to doubt that the difficulties in the early spring on the Sinkiang-Outer Mongolia border were caused by Chinese attempts to resettle Kazak nomads who fled into Outer Mongolia, were followed by Chinese troops who were driven back by Mongols. The Soviet Minister in Outer Mongolia stated that Mongolian planes bombed points in Sinkiang in retaliation for Chinese bombings in Outer Mongolia. He did not appear concerned regarding the situation now.

AREAS WILL BEAR WATCHING

Soviet officials placed primary responsibility on General Sheng for their difficulties in Sinkiang, but our consul at Tihua and our Embassy officials felt that Sheng as acting as a front for Chungking, willingly or unwittingly. Singkiang is an area which will bear watching.

Due to bad weather at Chungking, we stopped for 2 hours at the large Twentieth Bomber Command (B-29) airfield near Chengtu. The first bombing of Japan had taken place only a few days before. We found morale good but complaint was freely made of inability to obtain intelligence regarding weather and Japanese positions in North China and leak of intelligence to the Japanese.

Summary of conversations with President Chiang Kai-shek is contained in a separate memorandum. Principal topics discussed were: (1) Adverse military situation, which Chiang attributed to low morale due to economic difficulties and to failure to start an all-out Burma offensive in the spring as promised at Cairo; (2) relations with the Soviet Union and need for their betterment in order to avoid possibility of conflict (Chiang, obviously motivated by necessity rather than conviction, admitted the desirability of understanding with U. S. S. R., and requested our good offices in arranging for conference); (3) Chinese Government-Communist relations, in regard to which Chiang showed himself so prejudiced against the Communists that there seemed little prospect of satisfactory or enduring settlement as a result of the negotiations now under way in Chungking; (4) dispatch of the United States Army Intelligence Group to North China, including Communist areas, to which Chiang was initially opposed but on last day agreed reluctantly but with apparent sincerity; (5) need for reform in China, particularly agrarian reform, to which Chiang agreed without much indication of personal interest.

SOONG CONCERNED

It was significant that T. V. Soong took no part in the discussions except as an interpreter. However, in subsequent conversations during visits outside of Chungking he was quite outspoken, saying that it was essential that something "dramatic" be done to save the situation in China, that it was 5 minutes to midnight for the Chungking Government. Without being specific he spoke of need for greatly increased United States Army air activity in China and for reformation of Chungking Government. He said that Chiang was bewildered and that there were already signs of disintegration of his authority. (Soong is greatly embittered by the treatment received from Chiang during the past half year.)

Conversations with Ambassador [Clarence E.] Gauss and other Americans indicated discouragement regarding the situation and need for positive American leadership in China.

Mr. Wallace and Mr. Vincent [John Carter Vincent, director of Far Eastern Office of the State Department] called on Dr. Sun Fo and Madame Sun Yat-sen. Dr. Sun had little to contribute. He was obviously on guard. Mme. Sun was outspoken. (Mme. Sun Yat-sen is now an official of the Communist regime.) She described undemocratic conditions to which she ascribed lack of popular support for government; said that Dr. Sun Fo should be spokesman for liberals who could unite under his leadership; advised Mr. Wallace to speak frankly to President Chiang who was not informed of conditions in China. Mme. Sun's depth and sincerity of feeling is more impressive than her political acumen but she is significant as an inspiration to Chinese liberals. Dr. Sun Fo does not impress one as having strength of character required for leadership but the fact that he is the son of Sun Yat-sen makes him a potential front for liberals.

Mr. Vincent talked with Dr. Quo Tai-chi, former Foreign Minister and for many years Ambassador in London, and to K. P. Chen, leading banker. They see little hope in Chiang's leadership. Dr. Quo spoke in support of Sun Fo under whom he thought a liberal coalition was possible. Quo is an intelligent but not a strong character. K. P. Chen said that economic situation had resolved itself into a race against time; that new hope and help before the end of the year might be effective in holding things together.

LITTLE OF NEW INTEREST

Conversations with other Chinese officials in Chungking developed little of new interest. The Minister of Agriculture (Shen Hung-Lieh, who incidentally knows little about agriculture) showed himself an outspoken anti-Communist. General Ho Ying-chin, chief of staff and minister of war, also an anti-Communist, is influential as a political rather than a military general. Dr. Chen Li-fu, minister of education, a leading reactionary party politician, also had little to say. Ironically, he took Mr. Wallace to visit the Chinese industrial cooperatives, which he is endeavoring to bring under his control to prevent their becoming a liberalizing social influence.

Conversations with provincial government officials were also without much significance. As an indication of political trends, there were unconfirmed reports that the provincial officials in Yunnan, Kwangsi, and Kwangtung Provinces were planning a coalition to meet the situation in the event of disintegration of central government control. In Szechwan Province the governor, Chang Chun, is a strong and loyal friend of President Chiang. The loyalty of military factions, however, is uncertain. In Kansu Province the governor, Ku Cheng-lun, is a mild appearing reactionary who, during his days as police commissioner in Nanking, earned the title of "bloody Ku."

Developments subsequent to conversations with General [Claire L.] Chennault and Vincent in Kunming and Kweilin have confirmed their pessimism with regard to the military situation in East China. There was almost uniform agreement among our military officers that unification of the American military effort in China, and better coordination of our effort with that of the Chinese, was absolutely essential. It was also the general belief that, the Japanese having during recent months made China an active theater of war, it was highly advisable to take more aggressive air action against such Japanese bases as Hankow, Canton, Nanking, and Shanghai. However, the factor of loss of Chinese life at those places was recognized as an important consideration. It was the consensus that Chinese troops, when well fed, well equipped, and well led, can be effectively used. A number of Chinese generals were mentioned as potentially good leaders. Among them were Gens. Chen Cheng, Chian Fa-kwei, and Pai Chung-hai.

MONGOLS IN CONTROL

In Outer Mongolia there is considerable evidence of healthy progress, military preparedness, and nationalistic spirit. Soviet influence is without doubt strong but political and administrative control appear to be in the hands of capable Mongols. Any thought of resumption of effective Chinese sovereignty would be unrealistic. On the contrary, it is well to anticipate considerable agitation in Inner Mongolia for union with Outer Mongolia after the war.

Specific conclusions and recommendations regarding the situation in China were incorporated in telegrams dispatched from New Delhi on June 28.

We should bear constantly in mind that the Chinese, a nonfighting people, have resisted the Japanese for 7 years. Economic hardship and uninspiring leadership have induced something akin to physical and spiritual anemia. There is widespread dislike for the Kuomintang government. But there is also strong popular dislike for the Japanese and confidence in victory.

Chiang, a man with an oriental military mind, sees his authority threatened by economic deterioration, which he does not understand, and by social unrest symbolized in communism, which he thoroughly distrusts; and neither of which he can control by military commands. He hoped that aid from foreign allies would pull him out of the hole into which an unenlightened administration (supported by landlords, warlords, and bankers) has sunk him and China.

Chiang is thoroughly eastern in thought and outlook. He is surrounded by a group of party stalwarts who are similar in character. He has also, reluctantly, placed confidence in westernized Chinese advisers (his wife and T. V. Soong are outstanding examples) with regard to foreign relations. Now he feels that foreign allies have failed him and seeks in that and the Communist menace a scapegoat for his government's failure. His hatred of Chinese Communists and distrust of the U. S. S. R. cause him to shy away from liberals. The failure of foreign aid has caused him to turn away from his uncongenial western advisers and draw closer to the group of eastern advisers for whom he has a natural affinity and for whom he has been for years more a focal point and activating agent of policy than an actual leader.

At this time, there seems to be no alternative to support of Chiang. There is no Chinese leader or group now apparent of sufficient strength to take over the Government. We can, however, while supporting Chiang, influence him in every possible way to adopt policies with the guidance of progressive Chinese, which will inspire popular support and instill new vitality into China's war effort. At the same time, our attitude should be flexible enough to permit utilization of any other leader or group that might come forward offering greater promise.

Chiang, at best, is a short-term investment. It is not believed that he has the intelligence or political strength to run postwar China. The leaders of postwar China will be brought forward by evolution or revolution, and it now seems more likely the latter.

POSSIBLE POLICY LINE RELATIVE TO LIBERAL ELEMENTS IN CHINA

Our policy at the present time should not be limited to support of Chiang. It is essential to remember that we have in fact not simply been supporting Chiang, but a coalition, headed by Chiang and supported by the landlords, the warlord group most closely associated with the landlords, and the Kung group of bankers.

We can, as an alternative, support those elements which are capable of forming a new coalition, better able to carry the war to a conclusion and better qualified for the postwar needs of China. Such a coalition could include progressive banking and commercial leaders, of the K. P. Chem type, with a competent understanding both of their own country and of the contemporary Western World; the large group of western-trained men whose outlook is not limited to perpetuation of the old, landlord-dominated rural society of China; and the considerable group of generals and other officers who are neither subservient to the landlords nor afraid of the peasantry.

The emergence of such a coalition could be aided by the manner of allotting both American military aid and economic aid, and by the formulation and statement of American political aims and sympathies, both in China and in regions adjacent to China.

The future of Chiang would then be determined by Chiang himself. If he retains the political sensitivity and the ability to call the turn which originally brought him to power, he will swing over to the new coalition and head it. If not, the new coalition will in the natural course of events produce its own leader.

AMENDMENT OF THE HATCH ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1243) to amend the Hatch Act.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, it is my belief that the bill, H. R. 1243, before the Senate today strikes directly at weakening and detracting from a law which has had force in holding in check—to some degree at least—corrupt political practices in our country.

It has become accepted fact that a person who is employed by the Federal Government, or who receives all or part of his salary from the Federal Government, may not actively engage in a political campaign or influence votes for a political candidate.

I was not a member of the Senate Rules and Administration Committee when the bill, H. R. 1243, was considered by it. But I have had the opportunity since to read the testimony taken on it, and the deliberations preceding its report to the Senate. I think the amendments made by the Senate Rules Committee, with respect to section 9 (b) of the Hatch Act, are an improvement to the measure which came to us from the House.

But I cannot agree that we should consider, in any broad way, weakening the mandatory provisions of the original act. Nor should we further confuse the issue by providing a new amendment to grant an exception to a certain group of Federal employees who happen to reside in counties adjoining the National Capital. I am not unaware that there are some inequities developing which should receive some attention in that respect.

But it seems to me that there is more reason today even than in the past 10 years since the passage of the Hatch Act, for adhering to its concept and intents, rather than to seek loopholes through its structure, or weaken the purposes for which it was created.

There are today in the direct employ of the administrative services of the Federal Government some 2,000,000 employees. Many millions more are engaged in contracting for Government work, or are working on State or local projects where their salaries are partially or wholly paid by the Federal Government.

Though all may not be subject to the provisions of the Hatch Act, it is a matter for consideration to realize that 14,416,000 American citizens today are receiving direct, regular payments from the Federal Government. Another 5,000,000 are on State and local pay rolls, partially supported by Federal funds.

Twenty years ago there was 1 Government employee to about 40 of the population. Today there is 1 Government employee to about every 22 of the population. And if we use only the working population in the comparison, there is one Government employee for every eight employed in other fields.

Twenty years ago, persons directly or indirectly receiving regular moneys from the Government—that is, officials, soldiers, sailors, pensioners, subsidized persons, and employees of contractors—represented about 1 person in every 40 of the population. Today—and our population has vastly increased—about 1 person out of every 7 in the population is a regular recipient of Government moneys. If those of age are all married, they comprise about one-half of the voters in the last presidential election.

Let us think that over. To bring the comparison in direct relation with one of the amendments in the bill we are considering, I am told that in Arlington County, immediately adjacent to the National Capital, out of 140,000 population in the area, 40,000 are Federal employees.

The Hatch Act, after setting forth what it means by political activities, requires, in section 9 (b), as it now stands, that a Federal employee shall be dismissed, and not rehired, if he is found to have engaged in political activities.

There is no shilly-shallying in the present law. It leaves no leeway for interpretation. It should perhaps provide specifically for hearing cases of violation instead of leaving that function to the Civil Service Commission. But if a case is proved, involving political activity, no matter whether committed in innocence or through lack of knowledge of the law, the employee must be dismissed.

This seems to me to have had a salutary effect, even though it may have resulted in injustice in a few isolated cases. I would be interested in knowing just how much injustice has been done. I have seen no presentation of such facts. Only a few isolated instances were presented to the Rules Committee by the Civil Service Commission.

I should be more interested to know with what vigor the Civil Service Commission is able to pursue a program of surveillance of Hatch Act violations—which must be numerous—than I am in hearing of a few instances of punishment for trivial offenses, on the basis of which the Civil Service Commission is seeking to be relieved of its responsibility for dealing out mandatory expulsion.

I think the Congress is not above blame. The present Congress is undoubtedly at fault for not providing adequate funds for compliance action under the Hatch Act. The Civil Service Commission admits that it can do little more than investigate the cases which are brought to its attention voluntarily.

It seems to me that fact presents a more serious consideration to the Senate than the pending bill, which proposes to weaken the mandatory provisions of the law.

Here we have the instance of a law already weakened by lack of funds for its enforcement, and it is proposed further to detract from its effectiveness by setting up a number of exceptions or processes to relieve offenders under the act from the weight of its hand.

The amendment to section 9 (b) of the Hatch Act contained in the bill, H. R. 1243, proposes to recognize offenses under the Hatch Act which may warrant a lesser penalty than mandatory expulsion. It proposes to bring back for consideration those expulsions which may have warranted a lesser penalty in the past and to reopen their cases, leading to possible reinstatement and reemployment in the Federal service.

Mr. President, this seems to me to place a tremendous responsibility upon the Civil Service Commission, which already admits that it cannot carry out a compliance program under the existing requirements of the law. The proposed amendment would create a diversity of new responsibilities, adding to present decisions upon dismissals, the job of setting up penalties less than dismissal, and of acting upon the reinstatement of persons heretofore dismissed.

In my opinion, Mr. President, it is opening the gates for wide discretionary action by an executive agency, and I am opposed to relaxing, to this or any other degree, the provisions of the existing law, as proposed by the amendment.

I think, seriously, as I view it, that it is opening the opportunity for token resistance only. If we must consider having the dignity of the Hatch Act lived up to, then the mandatory provisions for the lesser penalties certainly should not be as low as 15 days' suspension. I realize that injustices and inequities develop. I understand that almost any person seeking a Federal job at the present time must make application and must meet the requirements of the civil-service system. I am not willing to admit that in this great body politic and all over this great country there are people seeking Federal employment who are not able to know the rules and regulations of the act. The Hatch Act, harsh as it may be, has been an important part of our governmental processes for a good many years and should be respected and lived up to.

Mr. President, I do not take with too great a degree of sympathy the argument that persons seeking employment in any Government service and meeting the requirements of the Civil Service Commission examination, do not know of the hazards they are facing. I feel that to chip from the act here and there would weaken its entire structure and cause disrespect for the general purposes intended to be accomplished.

AMENDMENT OF LEGISLATIVE REORGANIZATION ACT RELATING TO EVALUATION OF FISCAL REQUIREMENTS OF EXECUTIVE BRANCH

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for appropriate reference, a bill and I request that the bill may be printed in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks, because I should like to take a few minutes of the Senate to discuss it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOEY in the chair). Without objection, the bill will be received, printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred, and without objection, the Senator from Arkansas may proceed. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill (S. 2898) to amend the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 to provide for more effective evaluation of the fiscal requirements of the executive agencies of the Government of the United States, introduced by Mr. McCLELLAN, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 138 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET

"SEC. 138. (a) There is hereby created a joint service committee to be known as the Joint Committee on the Budget (hereinafter in this section called the "joint committee") to be composed of 10 members as follows:

"(1) Five Members who are members of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate, three from the majority party and two from the minority party, to be chosen by such committee; and

"(2) Five Members who are members of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, three from the majority party and two from the minority party, to be chosen by such committee.

"(b) No person shall continue to serve as a member of the joint committee after he has ceased to be a member of the committee from which he was chosen, except that the members chosen by the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives who have been reelected may continue to serve as members of the joint committee notwithstanding the expiration of the Congress. A vacancy in the joint committee shall not affect the power of the remaining members to execute the functions of the joint committee, and shall be filled in the same manner as the original selection, except that (1) in case of a vacancy during an adjournment or recess of Congress for a period of more than 2 weeks, the members of the joint committee who are members of the committee entitled to fill such vacancy may designate a member of such committee to serve until his successor is chosen by such committee, and (2) in the case of a vacancy after the expiration of a Congress which would be filled from the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, the members of such committee who are continuing to serve as members of the joint committee, may designate a person who, immediately prior to such expiration, was a member of such committee and who is reelected to the House of Representatives, to serve until his successor is chosen by such committee.

"(c) The joint committee shall elect a chairman and vice chairman from among its members at the first regular meeting of each session: Provided, however, That during even years the chairman shall be selected from among the members who are Members of the House of Representatives and the vice chairman shall be selected from among the members who are Members of the Senate, and during odd years the chairman shall be selected from among the members who are Members of the Senate and the vice chairman shall be selected from among the members who are Members of the House of Representatives.

"(d) A majority of the Members of each House who are members of the joint committee shall together constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, but a lesser number, as determined by the joint committee, may constitute a subcommittee and be authorized to conduct hearings and make investigations. Any member of a subcommittee so designated shall constitute a quorum for the conduct of any hearing or investigation, but the concurrence of a majority of the members of such subcommittee shall be necessary before any report or findings may be submitted to the joint committee.

"(e) It shall be the duty of the joint committee—

"(1) (A) to inform itself on all matters relating to the annual budget of the agencies of the United States Government, during and after the preparation thereof; (B) to provide the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate with such information on items contained in such budget, and the justifications submitted in support thereof, as may be necessary to enable said committees to give adequate consideration thereto; and (C) to consider all available information relating to estimated revenues, essential programs, and changing economic conditions, and, on the basis thereof, report to said committees findings relating to necessary adjustments or revisions in appropriations as may be required to balance the budget;

"(2) to recommend to the appropriate standing committees of the House of Representatives and the Senate such changes in existing laws as may effect greater efficiency and economy in government;

"(3) to make such reports and recommendations to any standing committee of either House of Congress or any subcommittee thereof on matters within the jurisdiction of such standing committee relating to deviations from basic legislative authorization, or in relation to appropriations approved by Congress which are not consistent with such basic legislative authorization, as may be deemed necessary or advisable by the joint committee, or as may be requested by any standing committee of either House of Congress or by any subcommittee thereof.

"(f) The joint committee, or any subcommittee thereof, shall have power to hold hearings and to sit and act anywhere within or without the District of Columbia whether the Congress is in session or has adjourned or is in recess; to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents; to administer oaths; to take testimony; to have printing and binding done; and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable within the amount appropriated therefor. Subpenas shall be issued under the signature of the chairman or vice chairman of the committee and shall be served by any person designated by them. The provisions of sections 102 to 104, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 2, secs. 192–194) shall apply in the case of any failure of any witness to comply with any subpena or to testify when summoned under authority of this section.

"(g) Employees of the joint committee, upon the written authority of the chairman or vice chairman, shall have the right to examine the books, documents, papers, reports, preliminary and other estimates of budget requirements, or other records of any agency of the United States Government within or without the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That such employees shall not be permitted access to books, documents, papers, reports, estimates, records, or any other thing containing information classified for security purposes unless specifically authorized by the joint committee to receive such types of classified information.

"(h) At the request of any member of the Committee on Appropriations of either House or of any member of a subcommittee thereof, or at the request of any member of the staffs of such committees or subcommittees, professional employees of the joint committee may be detailed to advise and assist such committees or subcommittees or the staffs thereof during consideration of any appropriation bill or part thereof.

"(i) The joint committee shall, without regard to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, employ and fix the compensation of a staff director and such other professional, technical, clerical, and other employees, temporary or permanent, as may be necessary to carry out the duties of the joint committee, and all such employees shall be appointed without regard to political affiliation and solely on the ground of fitness to perform the duties to which they may be assigned: Provided, however, That such appointment may be terminated by the concurrence of a majority of the members of the joint committee. No person shall be employed by the joint committee until a thorough investigation as to loyalty and security shall have been made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a favorable report on said investigation submitted to the chairman or vice chairman.

"(j) It shall be the duty of each agency of the Government to supply to the joint committee duplicate copies of any budgetary request submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, either for regular or supplemental appropriations required for each fiscal year, with the detailed justifications in support thereof.

"(k) When used in this section, the term 'agency' means any executive department, commission, council, independent establishment, Government corporation, board, bureau, division, service, office, officer, authority, administration, or other establishment, in the executive branch of the Government. Such term includes the Comptroller General of the United States and the General Accounting Office, and includes any and all parts of the municipal government of the District of Columbia except the courts thereof.

"(l) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section. Appropriations for the expenses of the joint committee shall be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate upon vouchers signed by the chairman or vice chairman."

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, the bill which I have just introduced bears the title, "A Bill To Amend the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 To Provide for More Effective Evaluation of the Fiscal Requirements of the Executive Branch of the Government of the United States."

This bill, if enacted, will repeal the provisions of section 138 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 which established the Joint Committee on the Legislative Budget. That provision of the Legislative Reorganization Act, as we all know, has proved unworkable. The joint committee established by that provision of law under the Eightieth Congress, with the Republican Party in the majority and in control of the Congress, was unable to function in accordance with the provisions of that statute. Likewise, Mr. President, in the Eighty-first Congress under the leadership of the Democratic Party, that joint committee has not been able to function, and I think it may now be assumed that this provision of the statute is a dead letter and should be repealed or so revised as to give it some practical operating effect. I propose, Mr. President, to repeal that provision of the law and to substitute in lieu of that section of the Legislative Reorganization Act the provisions of the bill which I have today introduced.

Under the Constitution the Congress has the responsibility and duty of appropriating public funds for the support of all branches of the Federal Government. The Chief Executive, as the head of the executive branch, submits to the Congress a budget of estimated revenues, anticipated expenditures, and recommendations for appropriations to meet the operating cost of the Government. The President's budget is not mandatory upon the Congress, but it is most persuasive and is largely accepted by the Congress as a yardstick to guide it in making annual appropriations, and particularly so with respect to appropriations for all agencies of the executive branch of the Government. Under our system, the President recommends, but the final responsibility and duty with respect to appropriations are vested in the Congress.

To aid and counsel the President in his budgetary recommendations to the Congress, there has been created an agency known as the Bureau of the Budget established within the Executive Office of the President. The Bureau of the Budget has a staff and personnel of some 531 employees. Its work and duties continue the year around, and I regard it as an indispensable adjunct to the Office of the President and to the executive branch of the Government. Among other duties it is charged with the duty of screening requests for appropriations that are submitted by the different departments, bureaus, and agencies of the executive branch of the Government. Its services are of great value to the President in preparing his annual budget and in paring requests for funds by administrative agencies, and holding down the operating costs of the executive branch of the Government. Therefore, Mr. President, I do not have in mind, and I want to stress that it is not the purpose of the legislation which I propose to in any way hinder, obstruct, impair, or detract from the functions of the Bureau of the Budget. But, Mr. President, the Congress has the final responsibility for appropriating the funds requested by the several agencies of the Government and by the President in the budget he submits to us, and to enable the Congress to more intelligently and adequately meet this responsibility is the purpose of the bill I have introduced.

The President's initial estimate of expenditures for the present fiscal year was $41,900,000,000. Supplemental requests increased estimated and requested expenditures to $43,300,000,000 for the fiscal year 1950. Meanwhile, anticipated receipts had declined from an originally estimated $41,000,000,000 to a revised estimate of $37,800,000,000. This resulted in an anticipated deficit of some $5,500,000,000 for this fiscal year. On January 9, 1950, the President submitted his budget to Congress for 1951, the next fiscal year, in which he recommends total expenditures of $42,400,000,000 as against anticipated revenues of $37,300,000,000.

Thus the President's budgetary recommendations for fiscal 1951 at present envisions another deficit for 1951 in excess of $5,000,000,000. When the 1950 budget was submitted, the President envisioned a deficit of some $900,000,000, but it develops that the deficit for this fiscal year will be 6 times greater than the President anticipated or estimated when he submitted the 1950 budget 1 year ago. I trust that ratio of error will not hold true for 1951. But I think we can assume that, unless the Congress meets its responsibility to reduce the expenditures recommended by the President in the present budget, the deficit for 1951 will very likely greatly exceed the amount of $5,000,000,000, plus, which the President acknowledges will accrue if the Congress conforms to his wishes with respect to expenditures.

So, Mr. President, notwithstanding the excellent services rendered by the Bureau of the Budget in an administrative and advisory capacity to the President, we are confronted, it seems, with perpetual and increased deficit spending unless the Congress puts a stop to it and materially reduces the present tremendously swollen and rapidly growing annual cost of the Federal Government.

To establish and maintain sound fiscal policies, to prevent waste and unnecessary and excessive expenditures of the public funds, to keep the Government solvent and generally operating on a balanced-budget basis is the final duty and inescapable responsibility of the Congress itself. This is no easy task, Mr. President. It is a job that will require not only courage of individual Members of Congress, but one where the greatest of wisdom and skill should be employed—a job that Congress cannot adequately perform without securing the ablest technical assistance and counsel that can possibly be made available to it. That, Mr. President, is what I propose to do in this legislation.

This measure, Mr. President, would establish within the Congress a Joint Committee on the Budget, composed of five members of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives and five members of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, with an adequate technical staff, to serve as an agency of the Congress. It is to be a service committee to the Appropriations Committee of both Houses of Congress, with authority to study and further screen budgetary requests that come to us from the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. President, it might be asked, why not simply increase the staffs of the two Appropriations Committees of Congress? If that course were followed—and I think possibly the same results could be achieved by it—there would be absolutely a duplication of effort. To adequately staff one committee would cost as much as the expense of a joint staff.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the plan would enable the members of the Budgetary Committee to work together as a joint committee of the two Appropriations Committees, with a staff under its direction making an all-year-round study of budget requests.

As I proceed, I shall point out how the proposed legislation would make it possible for that to be done.

This committee will be adequately staffed with technical and professional personnel, and will have the job—an all-year-around job, Mr. President—of studying budget requests and expenditures in the various departments and agencies of the executive branch of the Government, with a view of eliminating unnecessary expenditures and in aiding—not supplanting—the Appropriations Committees and the Congress to make cuts and reduce appropriations in every instance where it can possibly be done without impairing essential and necessary services of the executive branch of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. If the Senator will wait for a moment until I make one further statement, I shall be very happy to yield to the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

So that proper studies can be made by this committee and its staff, it would also require that all agencies of the executive branch of the Government submit to the committee a duplicate of all budget requests for expenditures that they submit to the Bureau of the Budget. This would enable the committee and staff, Mr. President, to make studies along with the Bureau of the Budget; and, so, where the Bureau of the Budget or the executive branch of the Government fails to make reductions that can or should be made, on the basis of factual information that the studies and work of this committee may provide, the Congress certainly will be in a better position to make such reductions.

I am now very happy to yield to the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very much interested in the Senator's proposal. It must be evident to everyone that we should take steps to balance the budget. The question I wish to ask the Senator is whether he has had any estimate made as to the cost of the proposal he makes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I have had no estimate made, I will say to the able Senator, because the Congress can itself control it. We have had no estimate made, anymore than we have had estimates made of what it would cost to staff any other committee. But I may say to my distinguished friend that I cannot conceive that it would be necessary for us to provide a staff for this committee comparable to the staff which is provided for the Budget Bureau. They have 531 employees working the year round to prepare the budget which the President submits. With the limited staff with which we undertake to operate in the Appropriations Committee, as the Senator knows, it is an absolute physical impossibility for the present staff to begin to make the checks and the analyses of the budget and of all the requests which I believe to be essential if we are to reduce expenditures in a sound, businesslike way, and do it discreetly and with judgment, so as not to impair actual services of the Government which are needed, which are indispensable, and which are essential to a proper functioning of the executive branch of the Government.

As I pointed out a moment ago, I think the staff could well be limited, but if we provide, as our proposal would require, that the executive agencies of the Government, when they submit their budget requests to the Bureau of the Budget, be required at the same time to submit them to an agency of the Congress which would be prepared to work the year round, we would have information in advance of the hearings before the Appropriations Committee as to whether the requests had been properly screened, whether they had been reduced, what the requests were originally, and what action was taken on them. The budget comes to us now at the beginning of a session of Congress, when appropriation bills are being introduced. With the limited facilities we now have, it is a physical impossibility for the Congress to be certain it is doing the work which could and should be done.

I do not maintain, Mr. President, that what is proposed is the only approach or the only solution. It may not be. But I believe this bill will serve as a basis for the appropriate committees of the Congress and for the Members of the Senate to study this problem, to hold hearings, and to try to find some means, some vehicle, which we can employ to fortify and equip the Congress to do the job of reducing Federal expenditures. That ought to be done, and ultimately, Mr. President, in my judgment, it must be done.

The joint committee proposed by this bill will be specifically a service committee, having no authority granted to standing committees, nor would it be authorized to report directly to Congress. It will report to the Appropriations Committees of both Houses, and to their subcommittees, or, in certain instances, to other standing committees. It will have a staff director and be staffed by an adequate number of professional budget and technical experts who will be assigned to work with the agencies of the Government during the preparation of their annual budget in the same manner as the Bureau of the Budget now works with those agencies on behalf of the President. It will have access to the same information. There will then be available to the Appropriations Committees of both Houses of the Congress, at the time the President's budget message is received, detailed factual information on all items contained in the budget.

Again, Mr. President, I emphasize that I am not trying to set this up for the Senate alone, because if this service is worth while and needed, I feel that a joint committee and one staff could serve both Appropriations Committees, rather than to have a separate staff for each committee.

In this way the Congress can better, more fully and intelligently discharge its duty to the American people by reducing the cost of Government without at the same time crippling essential activities.

Mr. President, if after a thorough study of the bill it is determined, in the wisdom of the Congress, that it would cost more to service and to operate this staff and this committee than the anticipated savings would amount to, such a committee should not be established. But if by establishing such a committee we can reasonably expect to reduce the costs of Government, and have a proper and adequate check upon the executive agencies of the Government with reference to their expenditures, then, Mr. President, for each dollar of the cost of operating and servicing this committee we should get returns of many, many dollars in Federal savings.

It is further believed that this procedure will expedite and in some instances eliminate the necessity for formal hearings on certain titles of the appropriation bills which now require a great deal of the time of the Members of Congress and the officials of the executive departments. Through utilization of factual, detailed data compiled by its service committee, the Committees on Appropriations would be in immediate possession of information that must now be developed through long and tedious hearings. This new procedure cannot help but speed up the legislative process in the appropriation field.

Any investigation of the budget items will necessarily require a knowledge of the manner in which past and current appropriations have been and are being expended. The bill, therefore, proposes to grant to the new joint committee the additional responsibility of reporting to the appropriate standing committees of the Houses of Congress any matters which relate to the improper expenditure of funds, and areas in which economies might be effected through cutback of programs by legislative action.

Finally, as this proposed committee will have useful, detailed information in the formulation of the legislative budget, it is charged with the duty of submitting to the Appropriations Committees suggestions for adjustments or revisions in appropriations which may be made to balance the budget, or hold deficits to the minimum.

It is also contemplated that the joint committee, through its staff of experts, will obtain information as to estimated revenues and the general economic condition of the country from all available sources and submit such information to the Appropriations Committees.

Mr. President, one reason why section 138 of the Legislative Reorganization Act has not been found practical, is that the committee was not staffed, it was not equipped to do the job. So far as I know, no attempt to operate under it has ever actually been consummated. It has been found impossible for the Ways and Means Committee and the Appropriations Committee and the Finance Committee simply to say, "The revenues are going to be so much and the expenditures should not be more than so much," because the information has not been made available to them, and because the joint committee was not equipped and staffed with the talent necessary to acquire the information and make it available to the Budget Committee.

This function is a modified form of the duties imposed on the Legislative Budget Committee established in the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 and, therefore, section 138 of that act is repealed and the enlarged powers of the new joint committee substituted therefor. Senators are well aware of the fact that the Joint Committee on the Legislative Budget was unable to accomplish its duties primarily because it had no adequate information upon which to base a major policy decision on the maximum amount which should be spent for the operation of our Government. Its estimates, based on information supplied by the executive branch, failed to accomplish the purpose for which it was created.

This new budget committee and procedure to be established by this proposed legislation, in my judgment, will greatly improve our legislative appropriation processes. The establishment of this committee and this service will enable both the House and the Senate Committees on Appropriations to be provided with continuous, factual and detailed information relative to the various appropriation items and programs contained in the budget. By having its own facilities, a committee created by and responsible to it, the Congress will no longer be compelled to rely upon wholly ex parte evidence of need for expenditures by the administrative agencies of the Government that want to spend the money.

In my brief period of service on the Appropriations Committee, Mr. President—and I think this statement can be verified by all other members of the Appropriations Committee—we have had the situation that the President has had the Bureau of the Budget within the Executive office. The Bureau serves him. Members of the Bureau come before committees of Congress, together with the heads of the agencies of the executive branch of the Government and present their side of the matter. They support the budget. They come to committees of Congress prepared with statistics and other persuasive material and arguments to induce the Appropriations Committees and the Congress to grant them the money they say they want and need to spend. Under our present system we are simply having to take what is presented to us, or, in most instances, arbitrarily act to the contrary. The proposed system and procedure, however, would enable us not to be compelled, as we are now, even to act arbitrarily if we are to cut expenses, but would enable us to act intelligently on the basis of reliable information.

With about 1,800 items of recommended appropriations in the President's budget I think I can say without challenge from any source that no Member of the Senate or of the Congress, even though he may be a member of the Appropriations Committee, can possibly have the detailed knowledge or the time personally to examine each item separately and be satisfied in each instance that the item of expenditure itself is necessary or that the amount requested is the minimum required to do the job. In fact no single individual without any other responsibilities could perform that stupendous task, and certainly Members of Congress, already burdened with other tremendous legislative and official duties, can give the President's budget and the appropriation bills the time required for necessary screening of budgetary requests so as to be fully informed and thoroughly satisfied that the particular item and amount requested are fully justified. Every Member of the Senate knows that to be so. I dare say not a Member of the Senate would stand upon this floor and say he is familiar with every item in the budget and is satisfied that this or the other expenditure is essential and necessary to be made. It is physically impossible for each Member of this body, in the course of the performance of the heavy duties laid upon him today, so to inform himself through his own efforts.

This year, Mr. President, we are undertaking to process a single, omnibus appropriation bill. That means, Mr. President, that this measure will likely be retained in the House for quite a long time before it reaches the Senate. Certainly, it will take much longer to get an omnibus appropriation bill over from the House than it has in the past for the House to get over to the Senate separate appropriation bills for the different departments. Thus the Senate Appropriations Committee will experience this delay and cannot and will not know what the House bill contains until it has passed the House and reaches the Senate. We can well anticipate, therefore, that the time after receipt of the bill from the House until the end of this fiscal year will be comparatively short, and likely not sufficient for the Appropriations Committee of the Senate to give thorough and adequate consideration to the measure before the beginning of the next fiscal year.

I favor the single appropriation bill. I hope the experiment will prove advantageous and that it will be an improvement over the system of considering separate appropriation bills, which has been the practice in the past. But even if we continued the past procedure of having some 12 or 13 separate appropriation measures, the need for this service of a budgetary committee would exist, but with this change to a single, omnibus appropriation bill, the need is further accentuated.

I know that the present occupant of the Chair, the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] realizes the difficulties under which we are compelled to labor with a single appropriation bill, and that if we wait until after the House acts and sends its bill to the Senate before we undertake to make a study, or make any preparation toward passing an appropriation bill, we will find it impossible to give adequate consideration to the bill and study it and make the checks which ought to be made, in time to pass the bill before the end of the fiscal year.

For that reason I believe the chairman of our Appropriations Committee has, very wisely—I do not know that a decision has been made yet—proposed to begin hearings immediately on the basis of the budget, without knowing what action the House will or will not take. I believe that if we had in effect a system whereby we required the executive agencies of the Government to submit to the joint committee of the Congress the same request it submits to the budget, we also could make a year-around study, just as the President's advisers do, so we could be prepared to act when the time came, and act without the necessary delay which occurs under our present system.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. What the Senator from Arkansas is now discussing is a matter of vital importance to the Senate. In the judgment of the Senator from Nevada the Senate should take its place in the appropriation facilities of the Government. It was never intended by the Constitution, so far as I can determine, that appropriations must of necessity arise in the House. Be that as it may, this body must sustain its position in the matter of appropriating for the Government. With that in mind we have held several meetings of the Appropriations Committee. I am not at all certain, and I express only my own views, that the omnibus bill will be a success. But it is certainly worthy of trial. To that extent, we are entirely content to go forward and try to work it out successfully.

In keeping with that, let me say that as chairman of a subcommittee having charge of the appropriation bill for the State Department, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Justice, and the Judiciary, I have called a meeting of the subcommittee on the 31st of this month, and have requested the representatives of those agencies to appear before the committee at that time, with a view to going forward independently, hoping that we may have the printed copies of the House hearings, if they are then available, and may avail ourselves of such information as the House committees have been able to obtain, but also going forward independently ourselves, looking to our independent position in making appropriations for those agencies.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I thank the able Senator from Nevada. I may say that I believe that if this proposal were now in effect and if the committee were now functioning, the Senate Appropriations Committee could go forward with facts and information which would enable it to act intelligently and to expedite the work the committee will be compelled to do.

Through the utilization of fully developed information made available to them at the time when the budget is submitted, the Appropriations Committees of both the House and Senate would be better prepared to pass on appropriation items when the bill is under consideration, since much information and detail would have already been ascertained by the Joint Committee on the Budget and its staff, and made available to the Appropriations Committees.

Mr. President, this pyramiding cost of the Federal Government, which entails continuing and increasing deficit spending, causes many of us grave concern. I have felt that, as one Member of the Senate, I have a personal duty and obligation, as does every other Member of this body, to do something about this problem—not just talk about it and say I favor economy in government, but to do everything within my power to correct this situation. At least, Mr. President, I intend to make the effort. In fact, Mr. President, I started or attempted to secure action of that sort during the last session of Congress. Other Members of this body, having the same deep concern that I have about the policy of deficit spending, likewise undertook to take action at the last session of Congress to materially reduce Federal expenditures and balance the budget, or at least hold the deficit to a very practical minimum.

It will be recalled that during the last session of Congress various joint resolutions were introduced, by Senators from both sides of the aisle, calling for cuts of different dimensions in the appropriations, cuts that were definitely under the budget estimates and recommendations. Those resolutions were referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, of which I am chairman. The committee conducted extensive hearings, in an effort to report a resolution designed to bring about a sizable reduction in Federal expenditures.

The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments finally reported Senate Joint Resolution 108, which would have required the President to make reductions of from 5 to 10 percent in the total appropriations made during that session. One reason for that method of approach to this problem—and, Mr. President, it was an unorthodox method; I admit that was because some of the appropriations measures at that time had already passed both Houses of Congress. Others had been passed by the House and were then pending in the Senate. We could not recall the bills that had already been passed and enacted into law. In fact, the Congress was not prepared, it had not equipped itself with adequate facilities, Mr. President, to make the cuts wisely and discretely on the individual items in each appropriation bill that would have been required to bring about a reduction sufficiently large to balance the budget. The situation too, Mr. President, was considerably aggravated because the President's budget estimate of revenues was so inaccurate and because additional and supplementary budget requests so increased the amount of proposed expenditures that it had become apparent that the $900,000,000 deficit which the President's original budget for 1950 estimated was a great understatement of the reality. In those circumstances, it appeared to many of us that Congress had no other alternative except to pass a resolution on the order of Senate Joint Resolution 108, and to delegate to the President the power to reduce appropriations and cut expenditures between 5 and 10 percent, in the hope that the budget might be balanced, or at least that the deficit would be held to the lowest practicable minimum.

We know, Mr. President, the parliamentary obstacles and the administration opposition which that joint resolution encountered. Some 63 Senators, representing both political parties and more than 40 States in this Union, signed a petition urging the leader of the majority party to bring up the joint resolution in the Senate for a vote. That request was denied by the policy committee and the leadership of the majority. Therefore, Mr. President, the Senate was never given an opportunity to consider that resolution in its own right and upon its individual merits. Those of us who sponsored and favored it had to resort to the tactic of offering it as an amendment to an appropriation bill. Because it was offered as legislation on an appropriation bill, the rules of the Senate required, as all of us know, a two-thirds majority vote for suspension of the rule, so that the amendment might be offered for adoption. It was not adopted, Mr. President, I regret to say, although on that vote 49 Senators, a constitutional majority of this body, voted in favor of suspending the rule, so as to permit the resolution to be offered as an amendment, and only 28 Senators voted against doing so. Obviously, Mr. President, a majority of the Senate during the last session of Congress favored a reduction in Federal expenditures, but that parliamentary obstacle was resorted to and was interposed to defeat the will of the majority of this body.

Having met defeat, under the above circumstances, in an effort to pass Senate Joint Resolution 108, which could have resulted in a balanced budget, I tried to do something a little more modest. I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 131, which would have left untouched and unimpaired the present requirements of existing budget law, but would have added an additional requirement, namely, that the 1951 budget to be submitted include revised expenditure figures so reduced as to be in balance with estimated revenues. That would have given Congress the full picture of what the President wanted to spend and what he was willing to say he would spend if the Congress was unwilling to continue the policy of deficit spending, and insisted upon a balanced budget.

Mr. President, we are here confronted with a budget of expenditures, which the President wishes to make next year, in excess of $5,000,000,000 more than the anticipated revenues will be. Had that joint resolution become law, we would have had this budget with just another column of figures added to it. It would have shown what the President would have eliminated from the budget if the Congress insisted upon balancing the budget. That would have been helpful to us. It would not have been any more binding than the President's other budget recommendations, but it would have been helpful to a Congress that is economy-minded in response to the publicly expressed sentiment of the American people, who want government costs reduced and want to get the Government back on a sound fiscal basis.

Senate Joint Resolution 131 met with no opposition when I offered it as an amendment to the executive pay bill, relating to salary increases for officials of the executive branch of the Government. In fact, I thought the administration accepted it. No opposition was expressed to it in the Senate. As I recall, it was adopted without a dissenting vote. Being a Senate amendment, of course it went to conference. Although I do not know what occurred in conference or before the conferees met, I do find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 13, 1949 (p. 14442), the following statement by Representative EDWARD H. REES, a member of the conference committee:

> The bill, as passed by the other body—

He was referring to the bill providing for salary increases for personnel of the executive branch of the Government—> included a provision that would require the President to submit a balanced budget in addition to his regular budget. * * * I thought the provision had merit and sound reasoning. The President objected to this provision of the legislation. He opposed it so strenuously that he followed the unusual procedure of calling the conferees of both Houses to the White House, before they had opportunity to consider the measure, so he could tell the conferees he wanted that particular provision removed from the legislation.

So, Mr. President, Senate Joint Resolution 131, passed by the Senate, did not become law. It was stricken from the bill in conference.

Let me pause to remind my colleagues that I think it is now perfectly obvious that we are not going to get any help from the present Bureau of the Budget in respect to balancing the budget, because it is under the direction of the President; and I am quite certain that the President will contend this year, as he did last year, that the budget he has submitted is one he has pared down to the very minimum. We must either accept it or we must meet what many conceive to be our responsibilities as Senators and as representatives of the people by undertaking to find a way to reduce it, where and if it can be reduced, without destroying or unduly impairing essential services of the Government.

I have said that the final responsibility for fiscal policies rests with the Congress of the United States, but, Mr. President, the initial responsibility is and shall remain with the President of the United States. It is his duty to give consideration to and be concerned about the solvency of the Government and the pursuit of sound fiscal policies of the Government. He has the duty and responsibility of requesting appropriations of the Congress. The Congress has provided him with a staff of experts in the Bureau of the Budget to enable him to study the financial conditions of the Government, to screen requests for expenditures that come to him and, through him, to the Congress, from the different agencies of the executive branch of the Government. Thus, the Congress, in great measure, relies upon the President of counsel and guidance in the matter of Federal expenditures and, while the Congress has the final responsibility to say yes or no to budgetary requests of the President, this does not relieve the President from the duty to cooperate with the Congress in establishing and pursuing sound fiscal policies, in attaining and keeping a balanced budget, and in keeping the Government solvent. The President of the United States has just as solemn a duty as has the Congress to formulate sound fiscal policies, to the end that the Government may keep on a safe and sane course and not go down the road to insolvency, notwithstanding the fact that the final power is reposed in the Congress itself to prevent such a course.

I do not care to rehash all the arguments I made in support of Senate Joint Resolution 108 and Senate Joint Resolution 131 when those resolutions were offered as amendments to other bills at the last session of Congress, but I should like to point out the divergent views entertained and expressed by myself and by the majority leadership with respect to Senate Joint Resolution 108, as reflected by the debate when that measure was under consideration.

The majority leader, speaking in opposition to the resolution, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 21, 1949, at pages 8043–8045, stated:

> I maintain with all the sincerity I possess that the Congress of the United States has the responsibility for cutting appropriations. The President of the United States submits his budget to the Congress, and under the Constitution and laws of the country it is the duty of the Congress to say whether or not it will approve funds requested in that budget, whether it will cut the budget, or whether it will increase the budget. It is our responsibility; and in my judgment we should not shift the responsibility to the President of the United States and tell him to cut the budget 5 or 10 percent after we ourselves refused to do so in the Senate. For that reason, in view of what has happened in connection with appropriation bills which have come before us, certainly the majority leader is not going along with that kind of a resolution. We should have the courage to reduce appropriations if we desire to do so. If we do not have the courage to do it, we should not shift our responsibility to the Executive.

I pause to say I have confidence in the Congress. I believe the Congress has the courage to do it. I question that the Congress has equipped itself with the proper facilities and technical help to enable it to reduce it at all times intelligently. That is what I think is needed. That is what the bill I have introduced seeks to do.

A little later in the same speech, the able majority leader further stated:

> But, Mr. President, the Senate cannot do what is attempted to be done by the joint resolution, simply pass the buck to the President of the United States, and hope to convince the American people that we are doing our duty and accepting our responsibility as Senators. I say it is ridiculous to place that responsibility on the President, after he himself has said that he has had his experts work on the budget, that he has cut it to the bone; and then has sent it to us either to reduce or to increase. Now some Senators propose that we send the problem right back to him, that we delegate to him the power to appropriate for the Congress of the United States.

Like others, constituting a majority of the membership of this body, I did not accept what I conceived to be an unsound argument on the part of the majority leadership of this body. After listening to the able, but what I conceived to be the unsound, argument of our distinguished majority leader, I stated, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 29, 1949, at page 12391, as follows:

> I do not care who shouts that the passing of this resolution is an act of political cowardice. The President of the United States cannot escape his share of either the blame or the legal and moral responsibility for any deficit that occurs either great or small so long as the Congress does not appropriate in excess of his budget recommendations.
> No, Mr. President, this is not an act of political cowardice. On the contrary, it is sound legislation necessary in the public welfare, and failure to balance the budget or to hold the deficit to the minimum this legislation makes possible may well prove to be a stupid and dangerous blunder. The risk is too great. This living beyond our means in government must be stopped. It often takes courage to do our duty, and the duty to maintain sound fiscal policies now is so impelling—the safety and security of the Nation is involved.

I reiterate, with even stronger emphasis than then, that the necessity for maintaining sound fiscal policies is now so impelling as to involve the safety and security of the Nation.

When this resolution was defeated by a vote of 49 yeas to 28 nays, to which I have already alluded, certain newspapers—I believe one of them was the New York Times—on September 2, 1949, quoted the President of the United States as saying:

> The Senate has done the right thing. It was the duty of Congress to analyze all appropriation bills, and to pass them or not. It was not a function that they could transfer to the President.

I do not agree with all the President said, but let us accept this much of his statement:

> It was the duty of the Congress to analyze all appropriation bills.

I can agree with this, Mr. President. It is our duty to analyze them, and it is our responsibility to make the final decision. That is what the bill I have introduced today seeks to do—to better equip the Congress with necessary and adequate facilities to do just what the President says it is the duty of the Congress to do—to "analyze all appropriation bills." After having equipped ourselves to do a thorough job of analyzing appropriation bills and the President's budget, then the Congress can better meet its responsibility of voting the appropriations which the President requests of it, eliminating some items entirely and making reductions in others where reductions can and should be made.

Pursuing the argument that was made against Senate Joint Resolution 108, that it is the full responsibility of Congress to cut appropriations, and the President's statement that it is the duty of Congress to analyze all appropriation bills, it is obvious that unless the Congress adequately equips itself to do this, it definitely cannot adequately or fully meet that responsibility. If the Congress simply accepts the ex parte evidence submitted at hearings of the Appropriations Committees by the executive branch of the Government, including its Bureau of the Budget, and votes appropriations accordingly, for all practical purposes and effect it will simply be abdicating the power of appropriation to the Chief Executive of the Nation.

If we are going to follow the Budget plan, if we are going to take the evidence adduced before the Appropriations Committees from the heads of the executive agencies of the Government, if we are going to take that evidence without any question or check against it, then we are, in effect, absolutely delegating to the executive branch of the Government the writing of the "ticket" for appropriations.

Too long already the Congress has labored under the handicap of an outmoded system of checking against the executive branch of the Government with respect to budget requests for appropriations. This course cannot be continued in the face of the challenge that now confronts us. Deficit spending has already reached a down-hill momentum. The deficit for 1951, if the President's program is followed, will be greater than the deficit of $5,000,000,000 in 1950, and there is every indication that each succeeding year deficits will increase unless the Congress itself puts on the brakes. The American people want the brakes applied. The Congress is the instrumentality of the people that has the power to apply the brakes.

The urgency of action by Congress in this area has been stressed by many outstanding authorities who have joined in the large chorus of protests against unbalanced budgets in these times of high national income, high taxes, and a high level of prosperity. Speaker of the House RAYBURN is reported to have stated recently that "A prudent man pays his debts when he has the money."

Similarly, Dr. Edwin G. Nourse in a recent speech, which was followed shortly by his resignation as Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, stated:

> I am not happy either when I see Government slipping back into deficits as a way of life when production and employment are high, instead of putting its fiscal house in order and husbanding reserves to support the economy if less prosperous times overtake us.

Dr. Nourse reiterated his position in a speech at Richmond on January 13, in which he asserted that every effort should be bent toward getting the spending policies out of the red if the Nation is to avoid cracks in its economic structure, and stated that he told the President that—

> The administration has resorted again to inflationary short-cuts, and I think that the deliberate launching of a program for false prosperity is a grave mistake. * * * And I don't think the program is either sound or progressive.

I have not seen the article, Mr. President, and cannot vouch for the accuracy of it, but I am in receipt of a letter from one of my constituents, Mr. M. F. Sloan, a farmer of Pocahontas, Ark., from which I quote as follows:

> I have just read Senator Capper's The Reddest Menace to America is Government Red Ink.

Then he says, "I believe there is a lot of truth in it," and he quotes again from the article as follows:

> The flood of red ink can overwhelm and destroy us as individuals, as family units, and as a nation. It can be as devastating as an atomic bomb explosion. We had better stop it and the inevitable inflation that follows it, before it is too late.

Mr. President, I subscribe to those sentiments, and I resolve to do everything in my power to stop it. I intend to vote accordingly in this session of Congress.

In closing I remind my colleagues of what President Franklin D. Roosevelt said, before he became President, in a speech he delivered at Pittsburgh on October 18, 1932:

> If a nation is living within its income its credit is good. If in some crisis it lives beyond its income for a year or two, it can usually borrow money temporarily on reasonable terms. But if, like the spendthrift, it throws discretion to the winds, is willing to make no sacrifice at all in spending, extends its taxing up to the limit of the people's power to pay and continues to pile up deficits, it is on the road to bankruptcy.

Mr. President, I do not propose by my vote and by my services here to help America travel down that road.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I wish to invite my colleagues to study this proposed legislation, and I urge them to give to me and to the committee to which the bill will be referred the benefit of their study, their counsel, and their suggestions, to the end that we may all work together to do something about this problem which I think may well prove to be a challenge, a definite threat, and a danger to our future security and liberty.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I wish to join in the expressions of the able Senator from Arkansas. I entered the Chamber during the course of his presentation. I take this opportunity to join in the expressions he has made, to which I have listened. From observations made in a study throughout Europe a little while ago, I found, as have others, that today the American dollar is the only sound currency in the world. If anything should occur which would impair the integrity and strength of the American dollar, I do not know where civilization might go, nor where, indeed, the American way of life might go. So I join with the able Senator from Arkansas in expressing the hope that the Congress of the United States may take unto itself that which belongs to the Congress, and see to it that deficit spending shall be ended.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the Senator from Nevada.

THE WORK OF THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I sought recognition so that I might speak for a moment of the committee of which I have had the privilege for some time of being the chairman, namely, the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. That committee has as many members on its staff as has any other committee of the Senate, if not more than has any other committee of the Senate.

Hence, I think it entirely appropriate that I speak of the work of that committee. The Judiciary Committee, as the record will show, has presented to the Senate for consideration and has itself considered more legislation, more bills, more resolutions, and more matters of vital importance than has any other committee.

I do not say that with the idea of speaking disparagingly of other committees, but rather to show to the Senate of the United States the load which, through the Reorganization Act, was placed on the shoulders of the Judiciary Committee.

With that in mind I have had prepared a complete statement and summary of the work done and accomplished by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate during the first half of the Eighty-first Congress, and I ask unanimous consent now that the clerk may read and that there may be inserted as a part of my remarks a statement prepared from the records of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

SENATE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE WORK AND WORK LOAD, FIRST SESSION, EIGHTY-FIRST CONGRESS

The work load of the Senate Judiciary Committee during the first session of the Eighty-first Congress consisted of 39.2 percent of all Senate bills and resolutions introduced; 45 percent of all House bills and resolutions presented in the Senate; 40.5 percent of all bills and resolutions, irrespective of origin.

Not only did the Judiciary Committee get a far larger share of the work load than any other standing committee of the Senate; it also performed a larger share of all committee work than any other committee. Of 1,203 written reports filed in the Senate by all committees, the Judiciary Committee filed 524, which presented 43.5 percent.

The total of reports filed to the Senate does not give the whole picture of committee activity, because committee consideration of many bills resulted in adverse action and indefinite postponement. Furthermore, the committee handled and disposed of more than 3,000 individual immigration cases, involving suspension of deportation. Each immigration case is equivalent to a bill.

During the first session the Judiciary Committee received 1,244 Senate bills and resolutions and 402 House bills and resolutions, making a total of 1,446 bills and resolutions.

By the end of the session the committee has disposed of 498 Senate bills and resolutions and 352 House bills and resolutions, or a total of 850 bills and resolutions.

Of the bills thus disposed of, 122 were general bills other than claims or immigration; 498 were private relief bills; 210 were private immigration bills; 9 were general claims bills; and 11 were general immigration bills.

Committee approval was granted to 241 Senate bills and resolutions and 290 House bills and resolutions, or a total of 531 bills and resolutions of both Houses.

(It will be noted that written reports were filed by the Committee with respect to all but 7 of the 531 bills and resolutions approved.)

Of the bills and resolutions acted upon favorably, 75 were general bills other than claims or immigration; 302 were private relief bills; 138 were private immigration bills; 9 were general claims bills; and 7 were general immigration bills.

Bills indefinitely postponed by the committee included 257 Senate bills and resolutions, 62 House bills and resolutions, or a total of 319 bills and resolutions of both Houses.

Of the bills thus acted upon unfavorably, 47 were general bills other than claims or immigration; 196 were private relief bills, 72 were private immigration bills; and 4 were general immigration bills.

Measures pending before the committee at the end of the session included 746 Senate bills and resolutions and 50 House bills and resolutions, or a total of 796 bills and resolutions of both Houses.

Of these bills, 119 are general bills other than immigration and claims; 164 are private relief bills; 449 are private immigration bills; 24 are general claims bills; and 40 are general immigration bills.

It will be noted the committee disposed of 352 House bills and resolutions out of 402 such measures referred to it, leaving only 50 House bills and resolutions pending at the end of the session.

In comparison, out of 1,244 Senate bills and resolutions referred to it, the committee acted upon 498, leaving 746 Senate bills and resolutions pending.

(In this connection it should be noted the committee received 294 Senate bills and 117 House bills subsequent to June 30.)

Suspensions of deportation by the Attorney General, under authority delegated by the Congress, are submitted in groups; but in the committee, each such individual case requires separate investigation, appraisal, and action. At the beginning of the first session, there were pending in the committee 1,501 cases of suspension of deportation, to which were added 2,926 additional cases submitted during the session, making a total of 4,427 cases; of which 2,966 were approved, 38 were rejected, 85 were "screened out" and held for further consideration, and 4 were withdrawn by the Attorney General; leaving 1,334 cases "in process" at the end of the session.

(The Chief of the Adjudication Division of the Immigration and Naturalization Service estimates that during the second session of this Congress, approximately 5,000 additional cases of suspension of deportation will be transmitted to the Congress for approval. These 5,000 cases will include cases for the adjustment of the status of displaced persons, pursuant to the displaced persons law. No such cases of adjustment were included in the suspensions reported during the first session.)

During the first session, the committee received 138 executive nominations, of which 63 were Federal judges, 30 were United States district attorneys, 33 were United States marshals, 1 was Attorney General of the United States, 2 were assistant attorneys general, 3 were members of the Displaced Persons Commission, 3 were members of the War Claims Commission, and 3 were members of the Motor Carrier Claims Commission.

At the end of the session, nominations not yet acted upon totalled 29, of which 23 were nominations submitted within less than a week of the end of the session.

During the session, the committee and its subcommittees conducted 91 hearings, which involved 198 separate hearing sessions. The record of these hearings total 20,220 folios.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I file this report with the Senate as a compliment to the members of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, 13 members in all. Twelve of the thirteen, regardless of party lines, have devoted their time, their energy, and their best efforts to a collossal load which has been given to the committee. With our best efforts we have accomplished the result that is set out in this report.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. In a moment. I desire at this time to pay my personal respects and to offer my sincere gratitude and my compliments to the members of the committee, who, regardless of political lines, served with me on the committee.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DONNELL. Mr. President, the Senator referred to 12 out of the 13 members of the committee. I assume he was, in modesty, eliminating himself.

Mr. McCARRAN. That is correct.

Mr. DONNELL. If I may have the privilege of saying just a word with respect to the activities and work of our distinguished chairman, to my mind, as the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, he has made himself a place for many, many years in this great body, whether he be here in person or in memory, by reason of the great and outstanding service which he is rendering and has rendered as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate. I take pleasure in saying this very brief word of tribute to him, and giving this expression of my admiration for his fine qualities, integrity, and ability.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am, indeed, grateful for the kind remarks of the Senator from Missouri.

At this time, Mr. President, I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to a highly important phase of the work of the Committee on the Judiciary. Having taken occasion to make an intimate study of the matter of immigration, and especially an intimate study of the matter of displaced persons as that phase of immigration comes to the committee of which I have the honor of being chairman, I draw the attention of the Senate to the colossal load of immigration matters which are referred to the committee. It is estimated that 5,000 cases will be referred to the committee during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress. The record shows the disposal of thousands of cases during the first session.

Mr. President, there are being brought into this country unlimited thousands of immigrants about whom there is a question as to whether or not they fit into our ideology. Indeed, no more vital question can come before the Senate and before the Congress than whether or not there are being brought into this country those who are enemies of our form of government. If that is the case, then the load that is placed on the shoulders of the Committee on the Judiciary and on the Congress of the United States becomes all the more burdensome, all the more important, all the more colossal.

I draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that it is estimated that 5,000 cases will come before the Judiciary Committee during the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, including the question of displaced persons. If that shall follow, then it is for the Senate and for the Congress to be alert every minute to every one of the immigration cases that comes before this body.

The staff of the Committee on the Judiciary, the membership of the Committee on the Judiciary, yea, indeed, the staff of the whole Senate, must be called into play in order that we may to the best of our ability determine whether or not any and every individual who comes here seeking admission to our land, or citizenship, is worthy of citizenship. If the screening that is taking place abroad is ineffective, unworthy, and incompetent, then it is time for us to devise another method of screening, another method of determination as to whether or not there are being brought into our country enemies to our form of government, and if that is so, then we must stop it.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARRAN. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. I appreciate the great burden that is placed upon the Senate Committee on the Judiciary by a requirement in the law—why it was ever enacted I am not quite clear—that the Committee on the Judiciary shall pass upon deportation cases. Obviously that is purely an executive function. Why should a committee of the Senate be required to pass upon the question of whether or not a person is lawfully in the United States? It would be just as reasonable to expect a congressional committee to go to Europe and screen every person who is proposed to be brought to the United States under any immigration law. That is clearly an executive function. Has the Senator ever considered the advisability of repealing that provision of the statute which burdens his committee with 5,000 cases?

Mr. McCARRAN. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Arizona, I will say that that has been a matter of consideration. So far as I am concerned, I would not advocate repeal, because it might appear that the committee is trying to shirk its duty. I am not one who will shirk his duty. I shall try to perform the duty as best I can.

Mr. HAYDEN. I am quite sure that whoever initiated that statute had no idea that a Senate committee would be required in one session of Congress to pass upon 5,000 deportation cases. It is perfectly obvious that Senators, along with their other duties, cannot individually look into cases of this kind. The function is purely an executive one. Congress enacts statutes providing who can and who cannot come into the United States. It enacts statutes providing for deportation of persons who are in the United States in violation of our laws. Why a committee of Congress should be required to perform an executive function I cannot understand. It is utterly illogical to me.

Mr. McCARRAN. I voted against the Reorganization Act; but it is the law. So long as it is the law, the Committee on the Judiciary will attempt to carry out its duties under the law. Let me say to the Senator from Arizona and to the Senate that it is almost impossible to carry it out as it should be carried out. It is almost impossible to carry it out with the staff we have. If that staff were augmented many times, it would still be highly questionable whether we could properly carry it out. However, I am not ready to shirk the duty, and I never shall. So long as the provision remains in the law we will carry it out to the best of our ability. We have not been able to meet all the obligations, but we are going to meet them as best we can. I wish to say to those who are critical, if there be those who are critical of the acts of the Committee on the Judiciary in passing upon deportation cases, that I want Senators to be more critical, because they cannot be too critical of those who are permitted to remain in this country and obtain citizenship, for that will make those persons more alive to their duties as citizens, and more willing to take part in carrying on the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, today of all times in the world, when our country is the pivot country of the world, we must maintain integrity in our citizenship, and that is true also with respect to those who have come here to make this their haven, their safe harbor, their hope for the future.

DELIVERED - PRICE SYSTEMS AND FREIGHT-ABSORPTION PRACTICES

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, it is my understanding that under a previous order of the Senate the conference report on Senate bill 1008 is to come up for consideration tomorrow. Inasmuch as the conference report differs substantially from the original bill, and as it was amended in the House and in the Senate, and also since there has been a change of members of the Federal Trade Commission, I made a written request of the Federal Trade Commission for their opinion on the proposed legislation. In response to that request I received a letter dated January 18, 1950, which represents the majority opinion of the Federal Trade Commission, and under date of January 19, 1950, I received a separate view by the Chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, Mr. Lowell B. Mason. I ask unanimous consent that the two opinions be printed at this point in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, January 18, 1950.

Hon. ESTES KEFAUVER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KEFAUVER: This is in further response to your letter of January 11, 1950, and the request therein for an analysis of S. 1008 as reported by the conference committee, and a statement of the Commission's position with respect to the bill in its present form.

The Federal Trade Commission believes that S. 1008 in the form in which it was reported from conference will greatly weaken, if not destroy, the effectiveness of section 2, of the Clayton Act as amended, as well as jeopardize and probably similarly affect other sections of that act. Two features of the bill are of paramount importance in this conclusion: (1) the definition of "the effect may be" contained in section 4–D of the bill and (2) the conflict between sections 2–B and 3 of the bill upon the issue of whether or not meeting the equally low price of a competitor in good faith shall constitute a complete defense to charges of price discrimination.

As introduced by Senator O'MAHONEY, Section 4–D of the bill defined "the effect may be" as meaning a showing of reasonable probability of the specified effect. For more than 20 years the courts consistently interpreted "may be," as used in the Clayton Act, as meaning reasonable probability. This interpretation expressed a declared intent of the Congress to use the Clayton Act to curb monopolistic practices in their incipiency. This definition was changed during debate in the Senate, but the original version was restored by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House. It is believed that this definition was intended to make sure that the meaning of "reasonable probability" should continue and to settle any doubts raised by the use of the term "reasonable possibility" in the decision of the Supreme Court in Federal Trade Commission v. Morton Salt Company.

The bill as reported by the conference committee provides, however, that the term "the effect may be" shall mean that there is reliable, probative, and substantial evidence of the specified effect. This definition requires evidence of an effect which cannot be obtained until after the effect has appeared. It therefore amounts to a provision that the words "may be" shall be read as "is." The definition would therefore no longer rest upon the standard of reasonable probability, and the Commission would not be able to proceed against a price discrimination because of its probable effects, or even its certain future effects, but could only proceed after the effects had actually occurred.

It has been said that the conference committee definition of "may be" was intended to affirm the standards of proof set forth in the Administrative Procedure Act. This purpose could have been accomplished by defining the term as a reasonable probability determined from reliable, probative, and substantial evidence, though this would have been repetitious of the standard presently applicable.

The conference committee's definition of "the effect may be" applies directly to the language of section 2 of the Clayton Act. The defined term also appears, however, in section 3 of the Clayton Act, prohibiting exclusive-dealing and tying contracts, and also in section 7, prohibiting corporations from acquiring the stock of other corporations when the effect may be substantially to lessen competition. Similarly, the defined term appears in the bill to amend section 7 of the Clayton Act which has been passed by the House, and which the President has just recommended that the Congress enact. Since it is unlikely that the courts would give one meaning to the term in one section of the statute and a quite different meaning in other sections of the same statute, the enactment of section 4–D of the bill would destroy the test of reasonable probability in section 2 of the Clayton Act and would seriously jeopardize, if not destroy, it in other sections of that act.

The principal question raised by the bill in its original form was whether or not meeting an equally low price of a competitor in good faith shall be a substantive defense to charges of illegal price discrimination. As introduced, the bill answered this question in the affirmative; as passed by the Senate this question was answered in the negative; as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House it was answered in the affirmative; as passed by the House it was answered in the negative; as reported by the conference committee the bill does not meet, but only confuses, the issue.

Section 2–B of the bill provides that it shall not be an unlawful price discrimination "to absorb freight to meet the equally low price of a competitor in good faith (except where such absorption of freight would be such that its effect upon competition will be to substantially lessen competition), * * *" Section 3 of the bill, which relates to any form of discrimination in price, provides:

"That a seller may justify a discrimination by showing that his lower price or the furnishing of services or facilities to any purchaser or purchasers was made in good faith to meet an equally low price of a competitor, or the services or facilities furnished by a competitor."

Thus, section 2–B of the bill invites the institution of proceedings when injury to competition results from freight absorption, while section 3 provides that the establishment of "good faith" in meeting an equally low price of a competitor shall be a complete defense to the charge of illegal price discrimination. The two sections point in opposite directions and, taken together, can only create confusion as to the legality of freight absorption.

Turning to the sections of the bill other than those just discussed, they do not accomplish any presently important public purpose. Section 1 of the bill is apparently intended to be declaratory of existing law and to write into statutory form what the Commission has repeatedly said is the meaning of the present statute. Section 2–A of the bill declares that postage-stamp pricing is not to be regarded as unlawful price discrimination. There has never been a case in which this Commission or the courts have found the use of this type of pricing to constitute illegal discrimination in price. Section 4–A defines the word "price"; section 4–B defines the term "delivered price"; and section 4–C defines the term "absorb freight." None of these definitions is seriously controversial or represents any departure from existing law.

It seems clear that any new statutory language, however innocent, or intended to be simply declaratory of existing law, will nevertheless entail long delays and much litigation, with all the attendant uncertainties, before it is interpreted by the courts with finality. These inevitable costs appear warranted only when they are outweighed by countervailing public advantages. Whether or not there was need for clarification of these matters at the time the bill was introduced, the Commission believes that the passage of time and the march of events has greatly reduced any public uncertainty as to the meaning of the law thus sought to be defined. A substantial contribution was made by the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit on August 22, 1949, in Bon Crown & Cork Co. v. Federal Trade Commission. To the results of new legislation must be added the destructive effects of section 4–D upon the effectiveness of the Clayton Act as amended. There must also be added the fact that the only important substantive issue raised by the bill in its original form had to do with the status to be given a defense based upon good faith in meeting an equally low price of a competitor in a proceeding charging unlawful discrimination in price, and the fact that the bill as reported from conference confuses without solving this question. It is therefore believed that the over-all effect of the bill will be seriously destructive.

For the reasons stated, the Commission is of the opinion that S. 1008 as reported by the conference committee will seriously weaken the Clayton Act.

The above does not reflect the views of Mr. Mason.

By direction of the Commission, and with personal regards, I am,

Sincerely yours,

LOWELL B. MASON,
Acting Chairman.

JANUARY 18, 1950.

N. B.—The Commission has not yet had an opportunity of ascertaining from the Bureau of the Budget whether its position in this matter is in accord with the legislative program of the President.

LOWELL B. MASON,
Acting Chairman.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, January 19, 1950.

Hon. ESTES KEFAUVER,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: As I noted in the letter to you transmitting the Commission's report that my own views were not in accord with the majority, I beg leave to present herewith my own evaluation of the conference report version of S. 1008.

Assuming as I do, that it is the legislative intent to make clear that the law shall not be construed so as to prohibit a concern from selling its products at delivered prices, nor for such a company to absorb freight to meet equally low prices of a competitor in good faith, and that it is desired to preserve the right of an individual seller to meet at the buyer's place of business competitive prices in good faith, it is my judgment that S. 1008, read in the light of its legislative history, will accomplish those purposes, and I am prepared to endorse the bill's objectives and to recommend its passage with an amendment of section 4 (D) as hereinafter suggested.

Those who would avoid the strong guiding hand of Congress upon our shoulders claim that there is no need for Congress to concern itself with our actions because the Court in the Bond Crown & Cork Co. case upheld the right of an individual seller to absorb freight, and that, therefore, such a practice was not now unlawful; hence no present legislation was required.

As far as the Crown & Cork case is concerned, a close examination of the Court's opinion will disclose that the Court said that the practice of freight equalization individually followed was not in issue, and the decision of the Court was limited to passing upon the question as to whether or not there had been conspiracy among the respondents to use the basing-point system. In considering the practice of freight equalization, the Court said:

"It should be noted in this connection, however, that the question in this case is, not whether such practice may be enjoined as constituting of itself an unfair trade practice, but whether it may be considered along with the other facts and circumstances to which we have adverted as tending to establish the conspiracy and combination in restraint of trade, which is the only charge in the complaint."

The Court further held:

"We need not decide, however, whether the freight equalization practice here involved constitutes of itself an unfair trade practice or whether it may be condemned as systematic price discrimination in violation of section 2 of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act, * * * as was held of the multiple-basing-point system in the Cement Institute case, as those questions are not before us. The practice unquestionably constitutes evidence to be considered, along with other facts and circumstances, as tending to establish the conspiracy charge; and that was the only purpose for which it was considered by the Commission."

It is apparent from the above that the Court in the Bond Crown & Cork Co. case did not pass upon the question of individual freight absorption or delivered prices independently arrived at, which are the subject matter of S. 1008. For this reason, in my judgment this case does not clarify the existing confusion. The Court left open the question as to what its holding would have been had the Commission attempted to prohibit the individual use of a freight equalization system by each particular respondent.

It is to be noted that there are cases pending in the Commission in which the independent use of freight absorption is challenged as being unlawful. It would be impossible, as well as improper, for me to forecast what our decision will be in these pending cases. However, you should be advised that the Commission some time ago authorized the filing and is presently prosecuting before it the following complaints which, if sustained, will condemn the independent, nonconspiratorial use of freight absorption: D. No. 4878, Chain Institute, Inc., et al.; D. No. 5253, National Lead Co., et al.; D. No. 5483, Clay Products Association, Inc., et al.; D. No. 5484, Clay Sewer Pipe Association, Inc., et al.; D. No. 5502, Corn Products Refining Co., et al.

The complaints in the above cases each contain a second count charging the individual respondents with unlawful price discrimination because of differences in net prices received after deductions of actual freight costs. These differences in net prices accruing to each individual seller, thus attacked as being unlawful, are inherent in any independent system of freight absorption, freight equalization, uniform delivered prices, or basing-point quotations. You will recall that count II of the Conduit case (affirmed by an equally divided Supreme Court) held nonconspiratorial freight absorption to be an illegal unfair method of competition.

Last June we advised the House Committee on the Judiciary that all of the Commissioners believe that on balance it is preferable to make the good faith meeting of a competitor's equally low price a full defense. No action has been taken by the Commission to change this view. The letter sent you yesterday over my signature indicates that the majority of the Commission take exception to the results of the amendments offered to sections 2 and 3. (These are the Kefauver amendments in the Senate, the Carroll amendments in the House, and the conference committee's compromise thereof.) While I agree it would have been preferable if these amendments had not been offered, I do not believe that they move in opposite directions.

The amendment to section 2 refers to good faith competition which will not substantially lessen competition. The amendment in section 3 refers to good faith competition that is not monopolistic or oppressive. These are relatively similar terms. In any event, however, it is not necessary that these restrictions be identical because section 2 refers to what is required for the Commission to prove its case, while section 3 relates to what is required for a respondent to affirmatively prove his defense if the Commission has made out a case. These amendments in sections 2 and 3 of the act appear to be adequate safeguards.

In section 4 (D) I would prefer the House version which defines the words the "effect may be" as meaning reasonable probability.

In my judgment, it can hardly be denied that there is at the present time widespread confusion as to the legality of the use of delivered prices by one seller, independent of conspiracy, the absorption of part or all of the transportation costs and the meeting of lower competitive prices, and that this confusion should be dispelled by legislative action. With the above amendment S. 1008 seems to be adequate to accomplish this purpose.

Sincerely yours,

LOWELL B. MASON.
JANUARY 19, 1950.

N. B.—I have not yet had an opportunity of ascertaining from the Bureau of the Budget whether my position in this matter is in accord with the legislative program of the President.

LOWELL B. MASON,
Acting Chairman.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I also wish to present for the consideration of the Senate a rather detailed anaylsis of the bill. But, first, I should like to acknowledge my indebtedness to the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] for an anaylsis he presented in the Senate on October 18, covering sections 2, 3, and 4 of the bill. This was an analysis with which I wholly agree. Using the distinguished Senator's analysis as a base, I have expanded it to include an analysis of section 1 of the bill and to include a somewhat more extensive analysis of section 4B of the bill. Likewise in other sections, I have expanded the analysis to develop several related ideas. On the other hand, I have condensed, revised, or omitted materials on other points which seem now to be better understood than they were last October. The distinguished Senator from Oregon is to be held in no way responsible for the faults of the final product, especially since he is not in the Chamber to defend himself. I simply express my indebtedness to him for an analysis which has been very helpful to several of us who have been giving particular study to this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the analysis may be printed in the body of the RECORD for the benefit of Senators when they are considering the report tomorrow.

There being no objection, the analysis was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANALYSIS OF THE BASING-POINT BILL, S. 1008 (AS REPORTED BY THE CONFERENCE COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE)

SUMMARY

Section 1 of S. 1008 would amend section 5 (a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Sections 2 and 3 would amend sections 2 (a) and 2 (b) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. Section 4 provides definitions of certain key phrases which appear in section 5 (a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act and in sections 2 (a), 2 (b), 3, and 7 or the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. The detailed analysis below may be summarized as follows:

Section 1

The language of section 5 (a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act is brief and general, but has a clear statutory purpose. Its purpose is to make unlawful "unfair methods of competition in commerce, and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce." The proposed amendment to this law is also in brief and general language, so much so that the courts would necessarily have to refer to the record of this legislation in order to find the congressional intent of the language. The legislative history of this proposed amendment provides no clear record of congressional intent.

Consequently, passage of this section would at best merely add confusion to the law. It is expected that at least 10 years of new litigation would be required to clear up the confusion and yield new guide posts. In the meantime, monopolistic pricing systems now in practice would go unchecked, and those recently broken up would be reestablished.

What the courts would ultimately take this amendment to mean is a matter of speculation. If the courts take as their guide the simultaneous action of the Congress in passing sections 2 through 4 of the bill, they will conclude that Congress intended to legalize any and all pricing practices, except those systems maintained by open agreement among competitors.

Section 2A

This section would exempt, without qualification, the postage-stamp price system and the limited-zone price system from possible illegality under the law governing price discriminations. If steel or any other heavy industry, should adopt one of these pricing methods, extensive dislocations of industry could be expected to result.

Section 2B

This section confers exemptions upon freight absorption to meet the equally low price of a competitor. It thus exempts from possible illegality the Pittsburgh-plus system, the multiple-basing-point system, and the freight-equalization system.

The exemptions of this section are qualified to the effect that freight absorption is not to be exempted if it will be to substantially lessen competition. This qualification fails to adopt the standards of the present law in two respects: First, only one of the effects upon competition is named—"injury to competition," as under the present law, is omitted. Second, the present law is stated in terms of "effect may be"—the judicial criterion of which is "reasonable probability." Adoption of the word "will" renders the qualifying clause a nullity, since the future effect of a current act or practice cannot be proved in advance.

Section 3

This section would reestablish the good-faith defense as a complete and final defense against a charge of illegal price discrimination and would thus nullify the Robinson-Patman Act amendment to section 2 of the old Clayton Act.

The good-faith defense may be established in either of two ways. First, by a showing that two or more sellers are meeting, or offering to meet, one another's price. Second, that a seller can show evidence which would lead a reasonable person to believe that a competitor was offering the same price, although no competitor was in fact doing so. Sellers discriminating in price among their various buyers are in good faith so long as two or more sellers meet one another's price to the favored buyers, and the Federal Trade Commission could not issue an order terminating the discrimination, no matter what the effect of the discrimination upon competition.

The good-faith mechanism will work to destroy small business in two ways. First, there is a widespread tendency among sellers to make, in favor of large buyers, discriminations which are not justified by differences between the costs of serving the large buyers and the costs of serving the smaller buyers. (Differences in prices which are justified by differences in the costs of serving the various buyers would be legal—as they are under the present law.) Such favorable prices afforded large buyers enable them to put smaller competing buyers out of business without respect to the question of efficiency in the economic system. Moreover, when one seller offers a large buyer a special price, another seller usually will do so, with the result that both sellers would be in good faith under this bill. Even though the Federal Trade Commission could determine which seller made the discrimination first, it could not issue an order stopping the discrimination.

The second way in which the "good faith" mechanism would work to destroy small business is that whereby large sellers would destroy small competing sellers. A large seller with sales outlets over several areas or territories can usually destroy his small competitors whose outlets are confined to single territory, simply by cutting the price to cost—or below cost—in one territory at a time. This technique always enables the large seller to win out, and it thus destroys smaller business firms to the advantage of the larger firms without respect to the question of which is the more efficient. When one seller makes a special price cut in a particular territory, one other seller will usually follow suit—thus both sellers would be in "good faith" under this bill.

Section 4

This section provides definitions for certain key phrases appearing in the other sections. It does not, however, provide a definition of certain key terms—which happen to be new terms to the law—appearing in section 1. These terms are: "monopolistic" and "oppressive" practices. The definitions provided in subsections 4A through 4C make no substantive change in law, other than those changes indicated where the terms appear in sections 1 through 3. Section 4D would, however, make a substantial change in law. It provides that the term "'effect may be' shall mean that there is reliable, probative and substantial evidence of the effect."

The decision of the Commission or the courts that a given act or practice may have, will have, or has had, a specified effect is necessarily an interpretation, conclusion, or judgment drawn from fact.

Thus this definition, which ordinarily applies to the procedure for admitting facts to the record, would also require that the Commission and the courts prove the accuracy of their conclusions by reliable, probative, and substantial evidence.

ANALYSIS OF SECTION 1

Section 1 of S. 1008 would amend section 5 (a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Any proposal to amend this act raises peculiar problems with the judicial branch of the Government and, in brief, any amendment which would successfully clarify this act must go to some pains to instruct the courts in their duties under the act. This may be explained as follows:

First of all, it should be noted that section 5 (a) is the very heart of the Federal Trade Commission Act. Other sections of this act relate to the organization and internal procedures of the Commission, the salaries of the Commission, procedures in taking evidence, investigatory powers, and such matters. Later sections of the statute forbid false and misleading advertising in "food", "drugs", "devices", and "cosmetics", and provide for the Commission's enforcement. But the legal prohibitions covering the broad field of unfair methods of competition—that is, business methods and practices which are sometimes described as "monopolistic"—are all contained in section 5 (a). Yet, this language is quite brief and in quite general terms. It prohibits what are called unfair methods of competition, but nowhere in the law are the acts and practices to be regarded as unfair methods defined. It may be quoted as follows:

"Unfair methods of competition in commerce, and unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce, are hereby declared unlawful."

The legislators who drafted this law in 1914 first considered the question of writing into the law precise definitions of the acts and practices that were to be condemned as unfair, but decided to assign this task to the Commission and the courts. The act was passed, therefore, with a clear record of legislative intent by which it was understood that the term "unfair methods of competition" was to include not only the acts and practices condemned by the then existing common law, but that as a better understanding of other practices was gained, or new practices were invented, those that contravened the general purpose of the act were to be defined as coming within its prohibitions.

The Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Stone, made a complete review of the legislative history of this act in Federal Trade Commission v. R. F. Keppel Bro., Inc., and concluded in part as follows (291 U. S. 304, 310-312):

"Neither the language nor the history of the act suggest that Congress intended to confine the forbidden methods to fixed and unyielding categories. The common law afforded a definition of unfair competition and, before the enactment of the Federal Trade Commission Act, the Sherman Anti-trust Act had laid its inhibition upon combinations to restrain or monopolize interstate commerce which the courts had construed to include restraints upon competition in interstate commerce. It would not have been a difficult feat of draftsmanship to have restricted the operation of the Trade Commision Act to those methods of competition in interstate commerce which are forbidden at common law or which are likely to grow into violations of the Sherman Act, if that had been the purpose of the legislation.

"The act undoubtedly was aimed at all the familiar methods of law violation which prosecutions under the Sherman Act had disclosed. See Federal Trade Comm'n v. Raladan Co., supra (283 U. S. 643 (649, 650).) But as this Court has pointed out it also had a broader purpose, Federal Trade Comm'n v. Winsted Hosiery Co. (258 U. S. 483, 493); Federal Trade Comm'n v. Raladam Co., supra (648). As proposed by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce and as introduced in the Senate, the bill which ultimately became the Federal Trade Commission Act declared unfair competition to be unlawful.[1] But it was because the meaning

[1] The Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce, in recommending the bill in its original form, seems to have adopted the phrase "unfair competition" with the deliberate purpose of giving to the Commission some latitude for dealing with new and varied forms of unfair trade practices. The committee said in its report of June 13, 1914, S. Rept. No. 597, 63d Cong., 2d sess, p. 13:

"The committee gave careful consideration to the question as to whether it would attempt to define the many and variable unfair practices which prevail in commerce and to forbid their continuance or whether it would, by a general declaration condemning unfair practices, leave it to the Commission to determine what practices were unfair. It concluded that the latter course would be the better, for the reason, as stated by one of the representatives of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, that there were too many unfair practices to define, and after writing 20 of them into the law it would be quite possible to invent others.

* * * * *

"It is believed that the term 'unfair competition' has a legal significance which can be enforced by the Commission and the courts, and that it is no more difficult to determine what is unfair competition than it is to determine what is a reasonable rate or what is an unjust discrimination. The committee was of the opinion that it would be better to put in a general provision condemning unfair competition than to attempt to define the numerous unfair practices, such as local price cutting, interlocking directorates, and holding companies intended to restrain substantial competition."

Senator NEWLANDS, in introducing the bill for the committee, emphasized this feature. In answering the criticism that the phrase "unfair competition" lacked definition he said, 51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 11084:

"Our answer to this is that it would be utterly impossible for Congress to define the numerous practices which constitute unfair competition and which are against good morals in trade, for we are beginning to realize that there is a standard of morals in trade or that there ought to be. Germany does not hesitate by law to condemn practices in business that are contra bonos mores. It leaves their tribunals to determine what practices are against good morals.

* * * * *

"It is the illusive character of the trade practice that makes it, though condemned today, appear in some other form tomorrow. If we should attempt to define all the trade practices that can be devised, that would create dishonest advantage in competition, we would undertake a hopeless task."

which the common law had given to those words was deemed too narrow that the broader and more flexible phrase 'unfair methods of competition' was substituted.[2] Congress, in defining the powers of the Commission, thus advisedly adopted a phrase which, as this Court has said, does not admit of precise definition but the meaning and application of which must be arrived at by what this Court elsewhere has called the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion. Federal Trade Comm'n v. Raladam Co., supra, compare Davidson v. New Orleans (96 U. S. 97, 104).[3]"

As a result of the outcome of some of the recent cases decided by the courts under this act, the cry has been heard that the courts are usurping the legislative functions in deciding what are "unfair methods of competition." Yet, the record is clear that this is precisely the job Congress assigned to the courts. This was not an unusual assignment nor an impractical solution to a problem which the House managers of the conferees on the Federal Trade Commission bill described as "practically impossible to define unfair practices so that the definitions will fit business in every part of the country," and as "what is harmful under certain circumstances may be beneficial under different circumstances."

It was also not an impractical method of keeping the definitions sufficiently flexible to embrace newly invented unfair methods, where, as the same report said, "There is no limit to human inventiveness in this field." Business conduct which is newly condemned under this law appears in the record of judicial decisions, so that other businessmen may see what specific acts and practices are condemned and under what specific circumstances, and so judge their own conduct accordingly. It was undoubtedly because this procedure of defining "unfair methods of competition" was adopted in lieu of specific definitions written into the statute that no fines or penalties for violation of section 5 of the act were provided.

Section 1 of S. 1008 now proposes to amend section 5 (a) of the Federal Trade Commission Act by inserting certain broad language which purports to describe certain business practices that would henceforth be exempted from the law. Passage of this bill will make it pointedly clear that Congress disapproves of the way the courts have recently exercised their assigned duties in defining "unfair methods of competition." Yet, at the same time, the enactment of the highly generalized language of this amendment would not indicate any disposition on the part of Congress to supply the precise definitions itself. Moreover, unlike the legislative record of the original act, the record of this bill provides no clear guide of congressional intent by which the courts could determine how and in what ways they are deemed to have gone wrong. The history of this legislation to date does not show which of the recent court decisions are disapproved by Congress, nor does it indicate in which specific features of these decisions Congress considers that the courts have gone too far.

Clearly, there are only two cases under section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act which can have been at issue in this legislation. These are the Cement Institute case and the Rigid Steel Conduit case—this much the courts could determine. But where would they turn for further light?

When the courts came to test the theory that by section 1 of this bill Congress meant merely to clarify the law, and not to make any substantive change in law, they would have to conclude, tentatively, that Congress did not object to these two decisions, as such, but rather that Congress was condemning as confusing the opinions in which these decisions were announced. In testing this theory, the courts would find in the one existing committee report which offers amplification, that the Supreme Court's opinion in the Cement Institute case is severely criticized for what the report calls confusing obiter dictum. At page 3 of the report submitted by Mr. Walter on the part of the House Committee on the Judiciary (H. Rept. No. 869), the following statement may be found:

"Language in the opinion in the Cement Institute case indicating that individual absorption of freight and individual selling at delivered prices may be illegal is considered to be obiter dictum, but its effect has been very persuasive in promoting the confusion."

But no hint is given in this report which would guide one to the specific passages of the opinion which Mr. Walter considers to indicate that "individual absorption of freight and individual selling at delivered prices may be illegal." Indeed, many who have studied this opinion say they are unable to find language of such import.

It is manifest that the stated objective of this bill to clarify will not be accomplished by enacting a rebuke to the Supreme Court, without also enacting some clear guides as to how Congress wishes the statute to be interpreted.

On the other hand, when the courts began to explore the legislative history of this bill in search of the congressional intent behind section 1, they would find an indication that some Senators, at least, sought to cancel the law of the Rigid Steel Conduit case while, at the same time, to retain the law of the Cement Institute case. No doubt there is in the minds of some a distinction which can be drawn between the two. But if this is so, then the distinction clearly ought to be drawn. Many lawyers who have studied these cases are unable to see any distinction between the law of the two, and it is quite possible that the courts will be unable to do so. At least the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit was unable to see a distinction. It said that the legal issues before the court in the Rigid Steel Conduit case were identical with those before the Supreme Court in the Cement Institute case. (Triangle Conduit & Cable Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 168 F. 2d 175, 181 (C. C. A. 7, 1948).)

If, however, Congress has found that such a distinction does exist, section 4 of this bill fails to provide a clue whereby the courts can share in this discovery.

Finally, when the courts came to test the theory that Congress intended by section 1 of the bill to make a substantial change in the Federal Trade Commission Act, they would find a great deal of evidence to support this theory.

Section 1 of S. 1008 would amend the Federal Trade Commission Act to add the following:

"It shall not be an unfair method of competition or an unfair or deceptive act or practice for a seller, acting independently, to quote or sell at delivered prices or to absorb freight: Provided, That this shall not make lawful any combination, conspiracy, or collusive agreement; or any monopolistic, oppressive, deceptive, or fraudulent practice, carried out by or involving the use of delivered prices or freight absorption."

If it were not for the qualifying language following the word "provided," the preceding language would clearly legalize the Pittsburgh-plus system, the multiple-basing-point system, and any other delivered-price system, irrespective of the question of its "dangerous tendency unduly to hinder competition or create a monopoly." In view of the qualifying language, however, it is not certain what meaning the courts would ultimately construe this amendment to have. It is clear that pricing systems which are proved to be maintained by overt agreement and conspiracy among competitors would be illegal—as they are under the Sherman Act. What effective powers would be provided by this law for terminating such illegal systems are, however, not clear.

The terms "monopolistic, oppressive * * * practices" are new terms to the law. They are also highly general terms, and, consequently, it would be necessary in future litigation for the courts to explore the legislative record underlying their adoption in order to decide what the Congress meant by them. Here again the one committee report which provides amplifying language—the report of Mr. Walter—may be noted. In this report the entire qualifying clause, "monopolistic, oppressive, deceptive, or fraudulent practices" is defined as "practices designed illegally to drive a competitor out of business." If the courts should come to adopt Mr. Walter's definition of this qualifying clause, the result would be twofold. First, the phrase "deceptive and fraudulent practices" would be divested of its ordinary meaning, and in lieu thereof it would come to mean "practices designed illegally to drive a competitor out of business." Second, section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act—insofar as it applies to pricing practices—would be limited in meaning to "practices which are designed illegally to drive a competitor out of business." The act would then no longer apply to the broad field of practices which are designed to protect competitors from competition or to confront the general public with monopoly prices.

This definition of Mr. Walter's is far different from the meaning of the term "unfair methods of competition" which Mr. Justice Brandeis referred to in Federal Trade Commission v. Gratz (253 U. S. 421, 427), as practices "against public policy because of their dangerous tendency unduly to hinder competition."

It is also far different from the meaning of the Federal Trade Commission Act Mr. Justice Black had in mind when he referred to the basing-point system in cement as "an effective instrument which, if left free for use of the respondents, would result in complete destruction of competition and the establishment of monopoly in the cement industry" (Federal Trade Commission v. The Cement Institute, et al. (333 U. S. 683, 720–721)).

It is not the purpose of this analysis to weigh the various purposes and understandings which the sponsors of this bill seem to have in mind, and thereby attempt to draw a net balance of the underlying congressional

[2] The phrase "unfair methods of competition" was substituted for "unfair competition" in the conference committee. This change seems first to have been suggested by Senator Hollis in debate on the floor of the Senate in response to the suggestion that the words "unfair competition" might be construed as restricted to those forms of unfair competition condemned by the common law (51 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 12145), The House managers of the conference committee, in reporting this change, said, House Report No. 1142, Sixty-third Congress, second session, September 4, 1914, at page 19:

"It is impossible to frame definitions which embrace all unfair practices. There is no limit to human inventiveness in this field. Even if all known unfair practices were specifically defined and prohibited, it would be at once necessary to begin over again. If Congress were to adopt the method of definition, it would undertake an endless task. It is also practically impossible to define unfair practices so that the definition will fit business of every sort in every part of this country. Whether competition is unfair or not generally depends upon the surrounding circumstances of the particular case. What is harmful under certain circumstances may be beneficial under different circumstances."

intent. It is reasonable to assume, however, that the guide which the courts would be most likely to adopt for interpreting what Congress meant by section 1 of the bill, would be that provided by its simultaneous action in enacting sections 2 through 4 of the bill. If this should be the case, then the courts must conclude that Congress intended to legalize everything, except open and overt agreements in restraint of trade.

A law which would exempt all monopolistic practices except those maintained by overt agreement would be tantamount to legalizing monopolistic agreement and conspiracy. In this modern, sophisticated industrial age, it is well nigh impossible for the antitrust agencies to find evidence of overt conspiracy. Business policies do not change from day to day; once adopted, they tend to remain stable over long periods. In short, the conspiracy of the old-fashioned variety, whereby exuberant entrepreneurs needed to get together from week to week or month to month in order to patch up their agreements, is an antique in the current-day business community.

Whatever interpretation the courts ultimately came to put on section 1 of this bill, the effect of its passage would create a prolonged moratorium on the law which it would amend. The past record of litigation under this law indicates that at least 10 years of new litigation would be required to clear up the uncertainties and provide business and the Commission with new guideposts. In the meantime, the monopolistic pricing system now practiced, as well as those recently suspended, would continue unchecked. Among the latter, it may be noted, are multiple-basing-point systems in milk and ice-cream cans, cement, steel, rigid steel conduit, and bottle caps; and, in addition, the Chicago-plus system in glucose (corn sirup), and the Tulsa-plus system in gasoline—the last-mentioned having been voluntarily abandoned in the summer of 1949.

Moreover, it is to be expected that under the extensive moratorium which this bill would provide, other industries which have not previously employed monopolistic pricing systems would take them up. In its final report, the temporary national economic committee included the following:

"Extensive hearings on basing-point systems showed that they are used in many industries as an effective device for eliminating price competition.

"During the last 20 years basing-point systems and variations of such systems, known technically as zone-pricing systems and freight-equalization systems, have spread widely in American industry."

It seems quite reasonable to assume that, since these monopolistic systems "spread widely in American industry" during the 20 years prior to World War II, they would continue to spread during the next 10 years. An effective moratorium upon these systems for such a period would, moreover, not only constitute a hardship upon the public interest, but would bring about a degree of hardship upon the industries themselves which came to adopt such systems—assuming that by the end of this period Congress could and would restore the law.

The Temporary National Economic Committee gave a persuasive answer to the argument that those who have been practicing monopoly should not suffer disturbances, in the following statement:

"The committee is not impressed with the argument that a legislative outlawing of basing-point systems will cause disturbances in the rearrangement of business through a restoration of competitive conditions in industries now employing basing-point systems. Such disturbances may be costly to those who have been practicing monopoly. But the long-run gain to the public interest by a restoration of competition in many important industries is clearly more advantageous."

Nevertheless, the truth still remains that monopolistic positions gained by default of Government action to preserve the public interest acquire forceful practical arguments for their continuance. Those who question Congress' practical power to restore the public interest now must conclude that such power would be sadly diminished by the time it came to consider legislation to correct this bill several years hence.

INTRODUCTION TO SECTIONS 2, 3, AND 4

Sections 2, 3, and 4 of S. 1008 would make far-reaching changes in sections 2 (a) and 2 (b) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. Each of these sections of the bill deals with questions of price discrimination, and each section is closely interrelated with all the others. For instance, although an individual section seems to modify existing law with respect to particular forms of price discrimination, actually each successive section makes still further modifications with respect to the forms dealt with in the previous section.

Because of the interrelationships between each of the sections, it may be well to take up first a change which would be brought about by section 4 (d) in the definition of certain key words which appear in the other sections. The key words are "the effect may be." The significance of a law which would define these words in a manner contrary to their usual meaning may be explained as follows:

Under the present law all price discriminations are not illegal. On the contrary, only those discriminations are illegal which have the specified effects set out in section 2 (a) of the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act. A discrimination is illegal, in the language of the law, where the effect of such discrimination may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition. The legislative history of the Clayton Act is unmistakably clear that the central purpose which the Congress of 1914 had in mind in framing this act was that of providing a law to stop certain practices before the adverse consequences which could reasonably be expected to follow such practices were in fact brought about. The term "effect may be" was used throughout several sections of the act, and as early as 1920 the Supreme Court recognized the intent of the term in deciding a question under section 3. In Standard Fashion Co. v. Magrane-Houston Co. (258 U. S. 346, 356), the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Day, spoke of this term as follows:

"Section 3 condemns sales or agreements where the effect of such sale or contract of sale 'may' be to substantially lessen competition or tend to create monopoly. It thus deals with consequences to follow the making of the restrictive covenant limiting the right of the purchaser to deal in the goods of the seller only. But we do not think that the purpose in using the word 'may' was to prohibit the mere possibility of the consequences described. It was intended to prevent such agreements as would under the circumstances disclosed probably lessen competition, or create an actual tendency to monopoly."

The effect of section 4 would be to substitute a law which would prohibit price discriminations which had already resulted in a substantial lessening of competition. Such a law might be compared to a traffic law which made it illegal for motorists to run through stop signs only if, after having run through a stop sign, the motorist had caused a substantial accident. Only after the accident had occurred could the effect of the violation be established by reliable, probative, and substantial evidence.

Analysis of section 2 (a)

The present law, in prohibiting discriminations of certain specified effects, makes no distinction between discriminations appearing directly in the quoted prices of goods, and those made indirectly by the seller's paying varying amounts of the freight charges for the different buyers. Changes in the present law which would be brought about by section 2 (a) may be summarized as follows:

1. Delivered prices which are identical at all delivery points would be legal under any circumstance, no matter what their effect upon competition. Delivered prices coming under this heading are of two types. The first is the so-called postage-stamp price, whereby a commodity is sold at one delivered price all over the country. The second type is a limited form of the zone price system. Such zone prices are those which come about when the sellers located in various parts of the country establish a single delivered price throughout the particular zone in which each seller markets his products. This form of zone price is distinguished from other zone prices only in that no individual seller, or no individual mill of a seller, sells in more than one zone.

Thus, if the bill should be passed into law, any commodity at all could be sold on either the postage stamps or limited-zone system; and such selling would not be subject to legal challenge, no matter how great the freight costs and no matter how much the adoption of such a practice might disrupt industrial location. For instance, if the steel companies should decide to designate the whole country as a single zone and quote one delivered price throughout the country, this practice would not be open to legal challenge—except, of course, upon the possible grounds that the various sellers had conspired to adopt this practice. But even as to the latter possibility, it might be observed that if one of the largest corporations in this industry, having mills in various parts of the country, should adopt such a method of selling, the other producers could hardly avoid following suit. If it should happen that the postage-stamp method of pricing became the practice in this industry, or the practice in any of several other basic industries, the disruptive effects upon the location of industry in the country could hardly be foretold.

2. Delivered prices which are different at different delivery points would be subject to legal challenge if they are discriminatory and if the effect may be that specified by the present law. But in such situations the restrictive definition of the term "the effect may be," as contained in section 4D, has a particular bearing. Such discriminations would be subject to a cease-and-desist order, provided the specified effects could be proved by reliable, probative, and substantial evidence. Thus, unlimited-zone prices, basing-point prices, and other variations of these systems would not be subject to a charge of illegal price discrimination until after a sufficient number of businesses had been destroyed to provide the reliable, probative, and substantial evidence which would be necessary before a cease-and-desist order could be issued.

ANALYSIS OF SECTION 2B

After conferring, in section 2A, exemptions upon freight absorption as practiced in a variety of zone price systems, the bill would confer in section 2D, exemptions upon freight absorption in general. This section would legalize, insofar as the law on price discrimination is concerned, "Pittsburgh plus" systems, multiple basing-point systems, and freight equalization systems.

The language of section 2B may be cited as follows:

"B. to absorb freight to meet the equally low price of a competitor in good faith (except where such absorption of freight would be such that its effect upon competition will be to substantially lessen competition), and this may include the maintenance, above or below the price of such competitor of a differential in price which such seller customarily maintains."

This language would make two drastic changes in existing law. First, it would limit possible illegality to only one of the effects specified in section 2 (a) of the present law—namely, "to substantially lessen competition." Thus, the decision in the Corn Products Refining Co. case (324 U. S. 726), decided by the Supreme Court in 1945, would be set aside. In this case, the Corn Products Refining Co.'s "Chicago plus" system used in the sale of glucose was found to be illegal on the ground that it resulted in a substantial injury to competition. This company has a plant manufacturing glucose at Chicago and another at Kansas City. Under its "Chicago plus" system, it charged buyers located in Chicago the Chicago base price, and it charged all other buyers the Chicago base price plus freight from Chicago to point of destination, even though shipments were made from its Kansas City plant. The Federal Trade Commission found that competition was injured among candy manufacturers—a business in which glucose is an important raw material. Several Kansas City candy manufacturers, for example, had been forced to move their plants to Chicago in order to take advantage of the lower price of glucose offered to their competitors in that city.

The language of section 2B would further exempt basing point and other pricing systems from illegality by the introduction of the new term "will be." Thus, if this language should become law, the Federal Trade Commission could issue no cease-and-desist order against discriminations carried out through freight absorptions, unless it could prove as a positive certainty that the discriminations will have the future effect of substantially lessening competition. Since it is not within the province of mankind to prove that any prospective event will certainly take place in the future, the effect of this language would be to legalize any and all discriminations carried out by means of freight absorption, irrespective of either the past or the reasonably probable future effects of such discriminations.

By this time it should be well understood that a law which confers upon freight absorption an exemption from the law on price discrimination must necessarily confer a corresponding exemption upon phantom freight. Should it not be clear, however, the matter may be illustrated as follows:

In the Corn Products Refining Co. case, the Commission found that the company in question received phantom freight on some shipments from its Kansas City plant and absorbed freight on others. The Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Chief Justice Stone, declared that:

"In the case of all shipments from Kansas City to purchasers in cities having a lower freight rate from Kansas City than from Chicago, the delivered price includes unearned or phantom freight, to the extent of the difference in freight rates. Conversely, if the freight from Kansas City to the point of delivery is more than that from Chicago, petitioners must absorb freight upon shipments from Kansas City, to the extent of the difference in freight."

Since there is no ruling on how high a seller may set his price, the Kansas City plant could, under the language of section 2B, avoid the definition that it was taking phantom freight by the simple expedient of announcing a convenient plant price. The convenient plant price would be the Chicago base price plus the freight from Chicago to Kansas City. Thereafter, sales made f. o. b. plant at this price would not include phantom freight, and all sales yielding a mill net return less than the announced plant price would be accounted for by freight absorption. Yet, as it may be seen, delivered prices from the Kansas City plant would be the same as under the company's Chicago plus system.

Still a third change from existing law appears quite probable under the language of section 2B. A literal interpretation of this language would mean that a seller would be free to absorb part or all of the freight charges for some customers, while refusing to absorb any freight charges for other customers in the same locality. For example, a steel mill in Chicago could absorb all of the freight charges on shipments to a favored customer in Denver, while refusing to absorb any freight charges to other customers located in Denver. Since freight charges constitute a major item in the delivered cost of steel, one may well imagine that such a discrimination as between competing buyers would soon put the unfavored buyers out of business.

REVISION OF NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Two of the incidental effects of section 2 of S. 1008, upon the National Transportation Policy are worthy of note.

Under this bill, the Federal Government would continue the exercise of regulation over common-carrier rates paid by sellers of goods. It would, on the other hand, relinquish regulation over the rates which buyers of goods would pay for common-carrier services, wherever sellers chose to exercise the privilege here extended them of reallocating the freight charges among the various communities to suit their fancy.

Similarly, the Federal, State, and local Governments presumably will continue to allocate the expenditures of public funds for transportation facilities. But, here again, instead of a consequent division of the benefits of such public expenditures accruing to both the buying and selling communities, the seller may arrogate all of the benefits of the public expenditure to himself, reallocate the benefits among other communities, or determine whether individual public facilities shall be used at all. It is a matter of record that under the basing-point systems recently practiced in the steel and cement industries, the producers would generally not allow these materials to be shipped by other than rail carrier. Moreover, in those instances where shipment by water or highway carrier was practiced, it was usually the custom of these producers to charge buyers the rail rates. These privileges would be legalized by section 2.

ANALYSIS OF SECTION 3

Section 3 of S. 1008 nullifies the Robinson-Patman Act amendment to section 2 of the Clayton Act. Thus it would restore the so-called good-faith defense to the status of a complete and final defense against a charge of illegal price discrimination, such as was its status under the old Clayton Act prior to 1936. The distinction between the exemption from the general rule against harmful price discrimination which would be provided by this section and the exemption which would be provided by section 2 of S. 1008, may be stated as follows:

Section 2 of S. 1008 would exempt illegally those price discriminations which are accomplished through the seller's manipulations of freight charges. Thus, these exemptions relate, for the most part, to discriminations between buyers at different geographic locations, and the amount of the individual discriminations so exempted is limited to the amount of the freight charges involved.

Section 3, on the other hand, would provide a more general exemption, relating to discriminations as between buyers in the same community as well as to buyers located in different communities. Where sellers could make the so-called good faith defense, their discriminations among buyers in the same community would be legal without reference to any question of their effect upon competition. Neither the question of how much the discriminations might injure or lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly, nor the question of how far these effects had already been advanced could raise any legal challenge to the discriminations. Similarly, discriminations as between buyers in different communities would likewise be legal, irrespective of whether the amount of the discrimination exceeded the amount of the freight charges involved in shipping the goods discriminated in.

Here it may be noted that section 3 of the bill drafted by the conferees differs from the corresponding section of S. 1008 as it was first passed by the House in that the conferees have removed the so-called Carroll amendment. Similarly, the bill drafted by the conferees differs from the bill previously passed by the Senate in that the conferees have eliminated the so-called Kefauver amendment. In lieu of the language of the Carroll amendment, on the one hand, or the Kefauver amendment on the other, the conferees have substituted a general qualifying clause which reads as follows:

"except that this shall not make lawful any combination, conspiracy, or collusive agreement, or any monopolistic, oppressive, deceptive, or fraudulent practice."

This is in part the same language which section 1 of the bill would put into the Federal Trade Commission Act. While the meaning of this language would not be clear, should it be put into the Federal Trade Commission Act, it cannot be said to be wholly irrelevant to that act. Similarly, it might be relevant if included in an amendment to the Sherman Act. But it is wholly irrelevant in extraneous language insofar as the Clayton Act is concerned. Moreover, it is in no sense a substitute for either the Carroll or Kefauver amendments, both of which proposed to retain some restraint upon price discrimination.

WHAT IS THE GOOD-FAITH DEFENSE?

Section 3 of S. 1008 provides that a seller may justify his discriminatory price by showing that it is made in good faith to meet the equally low price of a competitor. The burden of showing good faith would be upon the person charged with an illegal price discrimination, just as is the burden of showing justification under the present law. But what is this burden of showing good faith? What would a seller have to do in order to show that his price discrimination is in good faith to meet the price of a competitor and is, therefore, legal?

Under current judicial interpretations, the seller charged with an illegal price discrimination may show good faith in either of two ways: First, he may show that his discriminatory price did in fact meet the price of a competitor. Second, he may establish good faith by showing that he acted upon the belief that his discriminatory price would be meeting the lower price of a competitor, although the lower price of the competitor did not in fact exist. That is to say, if the seller charged with an illegal discrimination can show the existence of facts which would lead a reasonable person to believe that a competitor's lower price did exist, he can establish good faith.

These requirements for establishing good faith were made clear in the Supreme Court's decision in the Staley case. Referring to the good-faith defense, Mr. Chief Justice Stone said:

"Section 2b does not require the seller to justify price discriminations by showing that in fact they met a competitive price. But it does place on the seller the burden of showing that the price was made in good faith to meet a competitor's."

In order to establish good faith, according to this decision, the seller is merely required "to show the existence of facts which would lead a reasonable and prudent person to believe that the granting of a lower price would in fact meet the equally low price of a competitor." (Federal Trade Comm'n v. A. E. Staley Manufacturing Company and Staley Sales Corporation (324 U. S. 746, 759, 760).) This is the whole length and breadth of the seller's burden of establishing good faith. Neither the past nor future consequences of the discrimination, nor the seller's belief concerning these consequences enters into the question of good faith. The seller establishes that his discriminatory prices are made in good faith merely by showing that they meet the price of a competitor, or that he has evidence for believing that they do so.

Of course, if the Federal Trade Commission can show that discriminations in prices are made as a result of an illegal agreement or conspiracy among competitors, then the good-faith defense is overruled. Such, for example, was the outcome in the Cement Institute case. In this case, the Supreme Court held that, since the discriminations in cement prices were inherent in a pricing system maintained by illegal agreement and collusion among the cement manufacturers, the discriminations could not be said to have been made in good faith. But the seller's burden of showing good faith does not include the task of proving that his discriminatory price is free from conspiracy or collusive agreement. On the contrary, the burden of proving conspiracy—and therefore the absence of good faith—must necessarily be borne by the Commission. It is for this reason that the language concerning "combination, conspiracy, or collusive agreement, or any monopolistic, oppressive, deceptive, or fraudulent practice" which the conferees wrote into section 3 of the bill, in lieu of the Carroll or Kefauver amendments, neither adds nor detracts anything from the other language contained in this section of the bill. The most that this extraneous language could mean is that price discriminations which substantially lessen competition, could be found to be illegal under the Clayton Act, provided sellers practicing such discrimination are also proved to be in illegal agreement in violation of the Sherman Act or the Federal Trade Commission Act. Conversely, it would also mean that where two or more sellers are meeting one another's discriminatory price, or have good faith reason to believe that they are so doing, such sellers could never be in violation of the Clayton Act, unless they are first shown to be in violation of either the Sherman Act or the Federal Trade Commission Act. This raises the question, of course, why the conferees proposed to retain on the books a semblance of the law against monopolistic price discrimination when the presumption of their bill is that the Sherman Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act are adequate to prevent all practices which "substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition."

The death warrant for small business

By establishing the good-faith defense as a complete and final defense, S. 1008 would exempt sellers from section 2 (a) of the Clayton Act—no matter how great their discrimination and how destructive of small business—so long as two or more sellers met, or offered to meet, one another's price. Thus, if two or more sellers quote a low price to a large buyer, while demanding a high price from a small competitor of the big buyer, their discrimination would be legal and exempt from a cease-and-desist order, irrespective of all other questions (except the question whether the sellers were engaged in an illegal agreement).

Where a single seller made a discrimination having the monopolistic effects specified in section 2 (a) of the Clayton Act, and did not meet the price of another seller in so doing, the Federal Trade Commission could issue a complaint with some possibility that a cease and desist order might eventuate—provided the Commission could find out about the discrimination and issue its order before another seller met, or offered to meet, the discriminatory price. But once a second seller met, or offered to meet, the discriminatory price, the discrimination of neither seller could be stopped, even if it were possible for the Commission to discover which of the several sellers had initiated the discrimination. The fact that a second seller is currently meeting, or currently offering to meet, the discriminatory price would make the discrimination of both sellers currently legal.

It is apparent that the Congress which passed the Robinson-Patman Act was primarily concerned with correcting the nullity which the "good faith of defense" had made of the prohibitory language of Section 2 of the old Clayton Act. In reviewing the legislative history of this act in the Standard Oil (Indiana) case, the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit pointed out the position of the "good faith defense" under the old Clayton Act, and observed: "But since large buyers could always get such price meeting by suppliers to justify a discrimination in price in their favor, the purpose of the act to avoid such discrimination was easily evaded." Standard Oil Co. v. Federal Trade Commission (173 F. 8d 210, 215.) This court also pointed out that the chairman of the house conferees on the Robinson-Patman bill had explained the purpose of modifying the old "good faith defense," and quoted his explanation on the floor of the House as follows:

"It is to be noted, however, that this does not set up the meeting of competition as an absolute bar to a charge of discrimination under the bill. It merely permits it to be shown in evidence. This provision is entirely procedural.

* * * * *

"If this proviso were construed to permit the showing of a competing offer as an absolute bar to liability for discrimination, then it would nullify the act entirely at the very inception of its enforcement, for in nearly every case mass buyers receive similar discriminations from competing sellers of the same product." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 15, 1936, p. 9418.) (Standard Oil Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, supra (215).)

What was then said of the ability of large buyers to obtain from two or more suppliers discriminatory price quotations in their favor is no less true today. The tendency of sellers to grant special price concessions to large buyers is one of the most widely observed characteristics of business behavior.

This tendency, moreover, goes far beyond sellers' prospects of effecting cost savings in dealing with large buyers. The present law is not intended to discourage price discriminations which are justified by differences in the costs of supplying different buyers; on the contrary, the cost defense is always a complete and final defense against a charge of price discrimination.

The price discrimination which is philosophically indefensible on any grounds is that which goes beyond cost savings and permits large buyers to drive small buyers out of business. The individual seller may well reason that the prospect of an increase in volume of business which would result from his sales to a large buyer—or to any buyer whose business he does not already have—will result in cost savings by a further spreading of his overhead costs. But it is the total volume of business—the orders of all sellers, both large and small—which justifies overhead costs and permits the economies of mass production. It is not just the orders of the large buyers which do these things.

Just as the good-faith defense would legalize price discriminations by which large buyers put small buyers out of business, it would also legalize discriminations by which large sellers put small sellers out of business. A large seller with national sales outlets usually can, by making a special low price in one particular territory, destroy the small sellers whose established outlets are confined to that particular territory. This is true even though the unit costs and operating efficiencies of the smaller sellers may be the same or even more advantageous than those of the larger seller. When a large national seller makes a special territorial price cut, moreover, at least one other seller will usually follow suit. In such cases the good-faith defense would exempt the discriminations from a cease and desist order, irrespective of the destructive effects upon small business.

In commenting on the conference report on S. 1008, the Wall Street Journal of October 13 expressed the opinion that the real relief for industry contained in this bill lies in the good-faith defense which would be established by section 3. It is of pointed significance that this journal, which is conceded to be in touch with certain segments of business thinking, should look upon such a modification of the law as this as relief for industry. Since a modification of the law on price discrimination that would bring relief for some members of industry must necessarily place strictures on other members, the first question raised by this proposal is, Which members are to gain the relief and which to suffer the stricture?

ANALYSIS OF SECTION 4

Section 4 provides definitions of certain key phrases introduced elsewhere in the bill. Unfortunately, some of the new phrases introduced in section 1—namely, monopolistic, oppressive, practice—are not so defined. The definitions provided in sections 4A, 4B, and 4C appear to make no substantive change in law, other than those indicated in sections 1, 2, and 3, where the key phrases appear.

Section 4D would, however, effect quite a sweeping change in existing law. Here it is provided that:

"The term 'the effect may be' shall mean there is reliable, probative, and substantial evidence of the specified effect."

This definition would take away the normal legal meaning of the term "effect may be" and substitute a new meaning. It would, therefore, radically alter the meaning of the prohibitory language of section 2 (a) of the Clayton Act, as it probably would alter sections 3 and 7 of the Clayton Act.

The cited definition doubtless reflects an off-hand notion to conform the language of section 4D with that of the Administrative Procedure Act and may be counted—as may the other sections of the bill—an error of hasty and ill-considered legislation.

The Federal Trade Commission is governed by the Administrative Procedure Act. The relevant portions of section 7 (c) of this act may be cited as follows:

"Except as statutes otherwise provide, the proponent of a rule or order shall have the burden of proof. * * * no sanction shall be imposed or rule or order be issued except upon consideration of the whole record or such portions thereof as may be cited by any party and as supported by and in accordance with the reliable, probative, and substantial evidence."

This language describes established legal procedure and must be taken to mean, in ordinary language, two things: (1) The party instigating the suit has the burden of proof; obviously, a law-enforcement agency cannot allege a violation of law and call upon the defendant to prove himself innocent. (2) Facts alleged by either party, if they are to be admitted to the record and given consideration, must be supported by reliable, probative, and substantial evidence.

It is recognized, however, that decisions of the administrative agencies and the reviewing courts must of necessity be based upon interpretations, conclusions, and expert judgments drawn from the facts, and that such interpretations, conclusions, and expert judgments cannot themselves be proved by reliable, probative, and substantial evidence to be correct. Herein lies the distinction between the Administrative Procedure Act and the proposed amendment to the Clayton Act as contained in section 4D of S. 1008. The question raised under section 2 (a) of the Clayton Act is whether the effect of a given discriminatory practice will, if the practice is continued, be "substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly in any line of commerce, or to injure, destroy, or prevent competition." "It thus deals with consequences to follow," as the Supreme Court said of the term "effect may be," speaking through Mr. Justice Day in Standard Fashion Company v. Magrane-Houston Co. (258 U. S. 346, 356). The courts may use their intelligence and past experience to conclude that, under the circumstances shown, certain consequences may be expected to follow a given act or practice, but there is no "reliable, probative, and substantial" evidence that these consequences will follow.

The term "substantially" will serve to emphasize the distinction between fact and conclusion drawn from fact. The courts have had before them many times a question whether there had been a substantial lessening of competition, and have always been able to decide the question one way or the other. Yet, given all the facts and quantities which could conceivably be relevant to the question, the decision that a given quantity is substantial is ultimately a conclusion or judgment drawn from the facts, and is not itself a fact which can be proved by reliable, probative, and substantial evidence.

ANALYSIS OF PARTY PLEDGES

The elementary injustice to small business which S. 1008 proposes should be obvious to all Members of Congress, whether or not the portent to our political system is so. Any such drastic curtailment of the antitrust laws as this bill offers should, however, be considered in the light of the most recent pledges of the two major political parties.

The Republican convention, in the summer of 1948, wrote into its party platform the following:

"Small business, the bulwark of American enterprise, must be encouraged through aggressive antimonopoly action, elimination of unnecessary controls, protection against discrimination, correction of tax abuses, and limitation of competition by governmental organizations."

The Democratic Convention adopted in its platform, in July 1948, the following:

"We recognize the importance of small business and a sound American economy. It must be protected against unfair discrimination and monopolies, and be given equal opportunites with competing enterprises to expand its capital structure.

"We favor nondiscriminatory transportation charges and declare for the early correction of any inequalities in such charges.

* * * * *

"We pledge an intensive enforcement of the antitrust laws, with adequate appropriations.

"We advocate the strengthening of existing antitrust laws by closing the gaps which experience has shown have been used to promote the concentration of economic power. We pledge a positive program to promote competitive business and to foster the development of independent trade and commerce."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3905) to amend section 3121 of the Internal Revenue Code.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, the argument to be presented by the junior Senator from Washington in support of the motion he offered yesterday to call up House bill 3905, a bill which includes an amendment to reduce some of the wartime-created excise taxes, is to be so simple and clear that it can be understood by every Member of the Congress and by every citizen throughout the United States. Because the argument will consist only of what is obvious and factual, it will not take long to present.

As everyone knows, war excise taxes were imposed for three basic reasons, and at a time when our Nation was fighting for its life. The American people willingly accepted the burden of war excise taxes and acknowledged a justification of the need for imposing them.

The prime results of war excise taxes were that the American people traveled less, communicated less with each other, and purchased fewer consumer goods. Our Nation's economy was being devoted to energizing and feeding a war machine, for the protection of our Nation and that of our allies throughout the world. Our citizens everywhere gladly and knowingly accepted the sacrifices required through war-created excise taxes.

When the Congress and the President imposed war excise burdens on the American people, they were careful to explain to the people why the taxes were necessary. They made it clear to everyone that the taxes would be reduced and repealed when the war was over.

Mr. President, this is the 19th day of January 1950. The fighting war came to an end in 1945. Five long years have passed since World War II was concluded. This fact constitutes the most obvious and the simplest reason why I press a motion for the Senate to take action on a measure designed to reduce war-created excise-tax rates.

On July 11, 1949, the Senate Committee on Finance reported House bill 3905 to the Senate Calendar. That date was more than 6 months ago. The Senate Committee on Finance recommended to the Senate that war excise taxes be reduced for two pressing reasons. The committee maintained, and I assume every Senator agrees, that prevailing war excise taxes add unreasonably to the cost of doing business and materially reduce consumer purchasing power. If those reasons were valid 6 months ago, as I am convinced they were, they are more valid and pressing today.

The President of the United States has spoken glowingly about a trillion-dollar national income to be achieved in the second half of our twentieth century. The goal is both worth while and highly desirable, but it can only be approached and fought for if our people are encouraged and helped to buy more, communicate more, and travel more. The prevailing war-created excise taxes are a concrete restriction against each of these demanding needs. Why then, Mr. President, do we not agree to take action on H. R. 3905, which would be a constructive step in the direction of a trillion-dollar annual income, and do it now?

The majority leader [Mr. LUCAS] is vehemently resisting the motion offered by the junior Senator from Washington. What, may I ask, is the basis for his resistance? Yesterday he said—and it will be found on page 560 of the RECORD:

> The distinguished Senator from Georgia has assured the Senate he will call up this bill at the proper time. I have attempted to reassure the Senate, as majority leader, that we shall consider excise taxes.

What the senior Senator from Illinois said yesterday amounted to absolutely nothing, for his assurance was but a meaningless generality. On page 553 of the RECORD, the Chairman of the Finance Committee, the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], speaks for himself. He said:

> I am not against the lifting of the excise taxes. Many months ago I said they should be lifted. There is a bill on the calendar, very high up on the calendar, known as House bill 3905, which deals with these specific taxes, and that calender number can be taken up on motion at any time. If it is not taken up with the agreement of the leaders on this side, I myself propose, as I have already stated, to move to take it up at some reasonably early date.

In the face of these two comments by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Georgia, can any Senator forecast a date on which the subject of excise taxes will be debated by the Senate of the United States? If we do not want to debate the question, that is one thing, but if we are anxious to dispose of the matter we must agree on a beginning date for the debate. Should my motion carry, we shall immediately have the question before us. If the majority leader is serious, and if he does not want H. R. 3905 to remain dangling on the Senate Calendar as a juicy but unfulfilled political promise, I think he ought to agree to a specific date, which will bring the excise-tax question before the Senate. If the majority leader thinks it is not the proper time to take action on the excise-tax question, let him offer a definite date, in order that we and the country may know what he actually has in mind.

The majority leader took the junior Senator from Washington to task late yesterday afternoon on the charge that the latter was attempting to play politics. If one plays politics through an attempt to provide tax relief for the American people, then I happily plead guilty. If one plays politics by trying to secure action, which most people agree is needed, then I again plead guilty. If trying to proceed with a responsibility which the majority leader seemingly avoids for reasons of his own constitutes an attempt to take over the majority leader's leadership then, for the third time, I plead guilty.

All the majority leader has to say is to say something which is positive and which can be understood by everyone. If we are going to debate this question in this session, the second session of the Eighty-first Congress, let us promptly agree on a target date. The majority leader has only said up to this moment that he has attempted to reassure the Senate that we shall consider excise taxes. He knows and every Senator knows that the majority leader's attempt to reassure the Senate has failed utterly. An assurance without a do-date is no assurance at all.

There is no reason to believe that we will remain in session as long as we did in 1949. Both sides of the aisle will be anxious to take part in the coming elections. I think the majority leader will be foremost among those who desire to explain their assurances in person to their constituencies. On this assumption that the majority leader will help to see that the Senate recesses in early summer we must move much more rapidly and aggressively from now on than we did a year ago.

Should H. R. 3905 be brought up for consideration at this time and if it quickly passes it must then be returned to conference. All of this will take time. The sooner we approve the measure the sooner the House can be given an opportunity to support our action and the American people will the sooner be given that relief which they have been patiently waiting for throughout the past several years.

The American people, Mr. President, have been told by the President of the United States, by the majority leader of the Senate, and by most Senators, that they could expect some war-excise-tax relief. The people are now doing a perfectly natural thing. They are holding back from buying what they need and want until the Congress and the President has given them the promised relief. This situation is confusing and bad for both the consumer and for business. Is not it the best kind of good politics to take action on and satisfy the promises we have made to the American people about war excise taxes? I think it is and that is the reason I offered a motion yesterday to take up H. R. 3905.

Mr. President, I think that H. R. 1243, the pending business and a bill to amend the Hatch Act, is a deserving measure, but I hope that the majority leader will not tell us or the country that it can be favorably compared with the importance of the war-excise-tax question at this time. The Hatch Act does concern itself with politics. The excise-tax question concerns itself with the health and the strength of the American economy. Where relatively few persons either understand or are interested in the Hatch Act, almost every American has an impelling interest in our Nation's struggle to maintain the integrity and health of our economic structure. Why must we quibble and quarrel and waste time talking about what we automatically ought to undertake without argument.

Yesterday afternoon the chairman of the Finance Committee said that the war-excise-tax provisions in H. R. 3905 represented a saving or tax reduction for the American people in the sum of $670,000,000. Six months ago the committee recommended that these savings, and this amount of additional purchasing power, be granted to the American people at the earliest possible moment. Six months have passed since the Finance Committee urged the Senate to take action. After 6 months all the majority leader can do is to say that he has attempted to reassure the Senate that we shall consider excise taxes. The American people, Mr. President, are getting restless about these continuing but meaningless assurances. The American people want some action. The American people expect their Congress to get rid of those types of taxes which have completely outlived their justification.

The very least we ought to do, Mr. President, is to vote House bill 3905 up or down. We must not let it remain longer to mildew on the Senate Calendar.

Yesterday the majority leader, the senior Senator from Illinois, offered a series of reasons why the excise-tax amendment to the oleomargarine bill should not pass. He will shortly offer reasons why the motion offered by the junior Senator from Washington should not prevail. Listen carefully to the reasons he offers. His reasons today will be different from the reasons he offered yesterday. The substance of all his reasons will merely consist of a further delaying action against taking action to reduce war-created excise taxes. If the majority leader wishes to reassure the country that what I have said about his position is not true, let him, let all other Senators agree today on a given date for taking action on repealing excise taxes.

I trust, Mr. President, that the motion which has been offered, without pride of authorship, by the junior Senator from Washington, will prevail.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, if the parliamentary system of free government is to function with a modicum of expedition and dispatch, some member of the political party in power must be chosen to carry on the duties and obligations imposed upon the Senate by law and by rule. Every Senator knows that the party in power organizes for the majority of the Senate. I have the honor to represent the majority party in the Senate as majority leader. That great honor was bestowed upon me by my colleagues in a Democratic conference, by a unanimous vote. As a result of the power placed in my hands, I have a tremendous responsibility, not only to the Senate but to the country as a whole.

Mr. President, there is on this side of the aisle what is known as the Democratic Policy Committee, composed of some of the most distinguished Senators in this body. Once a week the policy committee meets, and at such times we make a careful examination of the bills on the calendar and arrange a schedule for their consideration in the Senate accordingly. As every Senator knows, the first bill the policy committee brought up for the consideration of the Senate was the bill to repeal the tax on margarine. The policy committee agreed to follow that with House bill 1243, to amend the Hatch Act. That was the considered judgment of every member of the policy committee, and that bill is the one which is before the Senate, in charge of the chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration.

Mr. President, the question of excise taxes is not involved in the motion of the Senator from Washington at all. The sole question before the Senate is simply whether the majority party, duly constituted and organized, shall be permitted to carry out the obligations and duties of the Senate of the United States in a way which the majority believes is best for the Senate and for the country. The question in this debate is not excise taxes; the question is whether a Senator on the opposite side of the aisle can take the leadership away from the majority party and advise the Senate and the country that from now on, any time the Senator from Washington desires to make a motion for the consideration of some measure in which he is interested, the majority of the Senators must go along with him.

It is a most unusual and unique motion which the Senator from Washington has made. The Senator is not a member of the Finance Committee. I do not know whether he is a member of any of the policy-making committees on the other side of the aisle. But the Senator who is responsible for offering the amendment to the Revenue Act which came over from the House of Representatives, the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] has not seen fit to attempt to do what the Senator from Washington now wants to do. No other member of the Finance Committee, whether a Democrat or a Republican, has seen fit to rise on the floor of the Senate and make the kind of motion which the Senator from Washington has made, to lay aside the unfinished business of the Senate, brought forward for consideration not only by the majority leader but also by the policy committee of the Democratic Party, take it out of our hands, and from now on permit any Senator who so desires to rise and offer a motion to displace the pending business and secure consideration of some measure, important or otherwise, in which he is interested.

Mr. President, I have the greatest respect for every Member on the Republican side of the aisle. I believe ordinary fairness and the custom which exists in the Senate will convince all my good Republican friends that the Senator from Washington is not in order in making this kind of motion. After all, Mr. President, it is the responsibility of the majority to make the determination as to when excise-tax matters shall be presented to the Senate. As I stated yesterday, the distinguished and eminent chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. GEORGE] has definitely given his assurance to the Senate that in due course, after a fair and full determination of the facts in connection with this important question, he will see to it that the Senate has an opportunity to consider the subject of excise taxes.

I reassure the Senate, as majority leader, that that will happen. There will be no question about it. But I repeat, Mr. President, that at this hour the question of excise taxes has absolutely nothing to do with the point I am making.

I think the Senators on this side of the aisle who unanimously selected me as majority leader will support the position taken by the majority leader and the policy committee.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Can the majority leader give us any more definite assurances than he has given as to when the matter of excise taxes, which is of interest to a great many persons throughout the country, will be presented for debate?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator makes a very fair inquiry, and I wish I could tell him definitely the date when excise taxes will be taken up. But I think the able Senator from Massachusetts, who is always fair in all his dealings with his fellow Members of the Senate, will agree with me that, at least, we should have an opportunity to see what the President of the United States has to say in his tax message, if we want orderly government so far as dealing with taxes is concerned. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts knows full well that the Senate, as a general rule, never considers a revenue measure until it comes from the House of Representatives. In fairness to the Ways and Means Committee, where revenue bills are initiated, it seems to me that we should wait a little while longer to ascertain whether the distinguished Members of the House who serve on the Ways and Means Committee will act with sufficient speed to satisfy the Senator from Massachusetts and the country as a whole.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LUCAS. I shall be very happy to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I point out to the Senator from Illinois—and I am confident he agrees with me—that while it is advisable to wait to hear what the President may have to say, and while it is customary to have revenue measures come from the House of Representatives, since we have pending in the Senate a bill on which the tax question can be debated and on which it can be voted, it would be helpful to have it voted sufficiently early so that it will not die in conference or die through inaction in either branch of the Congress. Does the Senator agree with that?

Mr. LUCAS. I wholly agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, and I can assure him, as the Senator from Georgia has assured the Senate, that House bill 3905, which is pending on the calendar, and which the Senator from Washington seeks to call up now and thus displace the unfinished business, will be taken up. To have attached the amendment affecting excise taxes to the margarine bill would have been a clumsy way to proceed because, as the Senator from Georgia well explained, when that bill goes to conference the conference will be with members of the Agricultural Committee of the House, the committee which reported the margarine bill. When we take up excise taxes the Senator from Georgia and other members of the Finance Committee would like to discuss them with the members of the Ways and Means Committee who handle revenue measures.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. CAIN. May I point out to the Senator from Illinois that the bill to which I addressed myself, H. R. 3905, does not come under the Committee on Agriculture in the House of Representatives. It originated in the Ways and Means Committee of the House. It is a revenue measure. The Finance Committee of the Senate saw fit to add——

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Washington is absolutely correct.

Mr. CAIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. I accept the statement of the Senator from Washington. I was still thinking of the margarine bill, which passed the Senate yesterday. The Senator from Washington is correct.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, may I ask the majority leader one more question?

Mr. LUCAS. Yes.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I listened with a great deal of interest and sympathy and accord to what the Senator said in regard to his duty and in regard to the duty of the majority party.

I should like to suggest to the Senator, and I think he will agree with me, that any Member of the Senate, whether he is of the majority party or the minority party, has the responsibility and the right to bring a matter to the attention of the Senate, as forcefully as he can, in any way in which he thinks it best, and at any time, as part of his duty, whether or not he is successful. Does the Senator agree with that?

Mr. LUCAS. Precisely. Any Senator has the right to do exactly what the Senator from Washington is doing. I am not questioning the right. I am only questioning the propriety of the Senator from Washington attempting to pursue such a course against the overwhelming opinion of the Democrats on this side of the aisle.

I mean to say, Mr. President, that we have a program. Some Senators may not like it. Some of the Senators on this side of the aisle will not like the program when we bring up FEPC. But it is going to be the program. Some Senators did not like it when we brought up minor amendments to the Hatch Act this afternoon, but it is a part of the program.

We formulate a program, and we try to carry it through. That is the way the Senators on the other side of the aisle proceeded when they were in power. We never attempted to take that power away from them at any time. I challenge any Republican to show that at any time any Democrat attempted, during the 2 years the Republicans were in power, to make a motion comparable to the motion made by my distinguished friend from Washington.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Maine. He is smiling, and I always fear him when he starts to smile.

Mr. BREWSTER. The only such episode I recall—and I think this was under Democratic control and when the distinguished Vice President was majority leader—was when the Senator from Montana moved adjournment one night without the presence or the approval of the distinguished majority leader at that time. It aroused considerable commotion, even to the point of expressions such as one the Senator from Illinois indulged in, that if such motion were approved it would amount to practically a vote of no confidence. That came from the Democratic side, and I should like to cite that as an illustration.

I did not hear all that the Senator from Illinois said, but I gather from his remarks that he assumes full responsibility for the program which we are to consider, and that if any particular measure in which many Senators may be interested is not brought up, it is not the fault of an individual Senator, so far as the Senator from Illinois is concerned.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct.

Mr. BREWSTER. The failure last year for 6 or 7 months to bring up any civil-rights measure was a responsibility fully assumed by the Senator from Illinois. Is that correct?

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Maine will form his own judgment as to what happened last year concerning civil rights, and no doubt he will try to place the responsibility for it on my shoulders. My shoulders are broad, and I have taken responsibility for a long, long time, and I will take much more responsibility. Whatever the Senator from Maine desires to say, either on the floor of the Senate or on the hustings, he is perfectly free to say.

Mr. BREWSTER. I merely wanted to have the record clear.

Mr. LUCAS. The record is always clear after the Senator speaks. I might remind my friend from Maine that perhaps there should be a little rejoinder to that, because the Republicans in the Eightieth Congress lingered a long, long time, and did little or nothing about civil rights, even though they had some bills on the calendar.

Mr. BREWSTER. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LUCAS. Yes.

Mr. BREWSTER. Is it not a fact that bills were brought up, and that the discussion which ensued on the Senator's side of the aisle made it seem impracticable to continue the discussion?

Mr. LUCAS. Yes; I recall when the Republicans moved the consideration of a civil-rights measure at the special session of Congress which the President of the United States called, and my friends on the other side of the aisle discussed the civil-rights measure instead of the various measures which the President wished to have considered and acted upon.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I do not believe anyone in this Chamber is any more interested in the early repeal of the excise taxes than is the Senator from Colorado. I have been very active in trying to have something done along that line for many months. But I realize the situation which is facing us. The Senate is not in a strong position in the present parliamentary situation. H. R. 3905 came over from the House of Representatives. It is not an important measure. The excise-tax repeal amendment which was placed on the bill in the Senate Finance Committee, by a divided vote of 7 to 6, is a far more important matter than the original bill. That puts us in a very weak position when we stop to think that the Senate alone cannot enact legislation. It takes the two Houses to enact legislation.

The Senator from Illinois has stated several times that we are anticipating a message from the President on the subject of taxes. I do not think the message, whatever it may say, will influence my desire for repeal of the wartime excise taxes. I think that no matter what the message may say, I shall still feel as I do about repealing those excise taxes. But I am only one Member of the Senate. There are 435 Members of the House, and some of the Members of the House may be extremely interested in what the President may say.

The senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] has stated several times that he desires to talk with the chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means, and the chairman of that committee is certainly entitled to that courtesy and that consideration. What I want is to see the excise taxes repealed. I am not interested in what record we may make in the Senate. So, in the interest of reaching results, it occurs to me that we had better move cautiously, though as rapidly as we can, work the matter out in a courteous way with the Members of the House Committee on Ways and Means, and try to enact an effective piece of legislation.

Mr. President, when the motion is voted on, even though the bill contains an amendment which I sponsored in the Committee on Finance, I shall have to vote to go along in an orderly way, in a sensible way, in a practicable way, in order to get some results. In my opinion that is the course the majority leader is following in this instance. So he may depend fully upon whatever support I can give him.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I am very grateful to my distinguished colleague and friend from Colorado for the valuable contribution he has made to the debate. After all, as I said in my previous remarks, he is the author of the amendment dealing with excise taxes. He realizes the delicate position in which we find ourselves, and I dare say he is much more interested in the repeal of the excise taxes than is the distinguished Senator from Washington, yet he is going to vote to lay the motion on the table, or to defeat it, whichever way the issue shall be presented.

Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] desires to make a few remarks, and I now yield the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, at the time the bill H. R. 3905 was reported by the Senate Finance Committee on July 11, 1949, I voted in committee against the measure. At that time I made the statement that I did not think it was consistent with sound economics to vote a tax reduction in view of the fact that we were then confronted with a deficit of approximately $5,000,000,000. However, I recognize the fact, since there has been so much said by Members on both sides of the aisle in favor of repeal of the excise taxes, that some action should be taken at the earliest date possible either to repeal these taxes or else reject the proposal in order that customers will cease withholding their purchases. At the time the bill was reported to the Senate I called attention to the fact that I did not think that at that late date, in July of last year, there would be any effort made to bring the bill before the Senate for action; and the results during the months that followed have proved the correctness of the position I took.

Yesterday when the amendment to repeal the excise taxes was offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BUTLER] to the oleo bill, I again voted against it, because I agreed with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] that that was not the proper bill on which to put an excise tax repeal provision. I thought that it should be handled only on a bill which would go to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives.

I am not at all sure now, when a vote is taken on the question of excise-tax repeal how I shall vote, because I strongly feel that a balanced budget should come first. However, I am going to vote for the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] this afternoon, because I think that it is important that we take some action at the earliest date possible, and either repeal the excise taxes or notify the customers and the merchants that they are not going to be repealed.

I also call attention to the fact that the bill as reported to the Senate calls for repeal of about $600,000,000 in taxes, yet there is not a Senator on this floor who does not recognize the fact that when we get through amending the bill it is going to call for a reduction of at least a billion dollars or more. There are now thirty-some-odd amendments which are scheduled to be offered.

Many Senators feel that if we are going to repeal excise taxes in certain fields, excise taxes on other items should likewise be repealed. I may offer some amendments of my own if the bill is brought before the Senate, although on the question of final passage I may vote against the bill, depending upon its scope and effect upon the budget.

Mr. President, I am seriously concerned with the program we have been following for the past 20 years of deficit financing. If Senators will read the Democratic platform of 1932, they will find that the Democratic Party pledged economy to the country and a balanced budget. In 1948, in Philadelphia, the Democratic Party in their platform were still pledging economy and a balanced budget. Yet it is a matter of record that during the past 36 years the Democratic Party has had control of the Government for 24 years, and during those 24 years they have never balanced the budget but once, unless they want to take credit for the balanced budget in 1947 and 1948; but the President of the United States said that that was not the result of any effort on the part of the Democratic Party, but that the Republican Party, which controlled the Eightieth Congress, were responsible for everything that happened during those 2 years. So surely we of the Republican Party are going to get the credit for the balanced budget during those 2 years, 1947 and 1948.

The only period the Democratic Party has ever balanced the budget, since the year 1912, was in 1916, when they did show a small surplus.

The truth of the matter is that the present Democratic administration have no intention of ever balancing the budget. They have deliberately launched on a program of deficit spending. I do not believe the members of the Democratic Party nor the President of the United States have the courage to tell the people of the United States the cost of the welfare program they are launching nor the courage to levy a tax bill of sufficient size to pay for that program.

It is time the American people realize that they are not going to receive any net reduction in taxes until first we reduce the cost of government.

Everyone is expressing concern at the $5,000,000,000 deficit last year. There is nothing surprising about that. During the calendar year 1949 we spent $5,340,000,000 more than was spent by the last session of the Eightieth Congress in 1948. So there is nothing at all surprising about the fact that today we are confronted with a deficit.

When we stop to consider that on June 30, 1949, we had a deficit of $1,800,000,000 and then that the Congress last year authorized expenditures of five billion more than the year previous there was nothing else to expect except a huge deficit.

That was the time, when huge appropriations were being authorized, to take pity on the taxpayer. Yet the truth is that only a small minority of us voted for the cuts. Unless we cut the proposed budget this year by at least from five to seven billion dollars we are again going to have a deficit.

Furthermore unless the cost of government is reduced, for every dollar of excise taxes taken off certain articles which the housewife is watching, they are planning to stick two or three dollars of taxes in some other place less conspicuous. This administration has no intention to reduce taxes, and I think the fact should be told to the American people in plain language.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an article published in the Wall Street Journal of January 18, 1950, defining the President's program on taxes.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAX REPORT—A SPECIAL SUMMARY AND FORECAST OF FEDERAL AND STATE TAX DEVELOPMENTS

Truman's message on taxes, due on Capitol Hill late this week or early next, will please few taxpayers or lawmakers.

White House advisers are now going over the final wording of the message, and the Treasury is busy writing legislation to follow up the President's proposals. Businessmen who hope Mr. Truman will propose lots of tax changes which would stimulate business will feel let down.

According to the latest list, the President will ask cuts in these seven excises only: The four 20-percent retail levies on furs, jewelry, luggage, and toilet preparations, to be 10 percent; the 15-percent tax on passenger tickets, to be 10 percent; the 25-percent rates on telegrams and long-distance phone communications, to be 15 percent; and the 3-percent tax on freight, to be repealed. The Treasury would stand to lose about $755,000,000 a year, unless the cuts stimulate sales and make up some of the loss due to lower rates.

Another crumb of tax relief will also be held out to businessmen.

Congress will be asked to spread tax credits for business losses over a 7-year period, instead of the present 5-year span. Under existing law, a company that suffers a net loss in 1950, can apply this against its taxable income previously reported for 1948 and 1949 and obtain refunds of taxes paid in those years. Then it can use any unrecovered balance of the loss to reduce taxable income in 1951 and 1952. After 1952, the company gets no further credit for the loss.

The Treasury wants the loss carry-back limited to 1 year, but it proposes to stretch the carry-forward out to 5 years. This would mean, for a company suffering a loss in 1950, a refund of part or all of 1949 taxes, and any balance of the loss still unused could be credited against tax liabilities in 1951–55, inclusive. Businessmen generally approve this change. Initially it might deprive them of some refunds but it would give them more time to offset their losses against profits.

Some investors with money in businesses overseas would benefit from the President's program. He will suggest that Congress allow corporations with branches abroad to treat them as separate subsidiaries, even if they are not set up in this fashion. The home office could then defer counting foreign income except when it is received here in dollars. Under present law, the branches' earnings are supposed to be counted, even if they're in blocked foreign currency.

Mr. Truman is not expected to propose any costly tax changes that would stimulate business, however. There has been talk of bigger depreciation allowances, special tax-free reserves for investment, and relief of double taxation of corporate profits which are hit once as corporate income and again as individual income when they're distributed as dividends to stockholders. But all these would involve substantial revenue losses.

The other points in the President's tax program will be complicated.

Much of the message will be devoted to tax changes designed to bring a moderate amount of additional revenue in the 1950–51 fiscal year which begins July 1, and to pave the way for bigger gains later on. This part of the message is a closely guarded secret, but officials say there is no way to offset $755,000,000 in excise cuts and still increase receipts in 1950–51 without tapping personal income taxes.

The President has repeatedly attacked the COP's 1948 income-tax cut for giving too big a break to upper bracket individuals.

Other revenue-raising proposals under discussion would increase the tax on corporate profits; tax corporations which are now operated tax-free by nonprofit institutions; tax interest on State and local bonds; increase levies on capital gains and on estates and gifts. There has also been talk of (1) decreasing the special deductions which are allowed mining and oil-drilling concerns to make sure they recover their investments before mineral reserves give out and (2) changing the tax formula for mutual life-insurance companies which have escaped taxes on investment income the past 3 years.

Does Truman want any tax bill?

It's hard to see how the administration could concoct a set of proposals less likely to fire congressional enthusiasm and be enacted. And even if the President's program isn't accepted, he can always say he wanted to cut excises and reduce the budget deficit.

Suspicion that this is all the President wants is fairly widespread. Experts at the Council of Economic Advisers say frankly they would rather see nothing done about taxes for another 6 months. By then, these men argue, business activity may be easing down again and a tax cut, rather than an increase, might be better economics. Treasury officials are certainly not enthusiastic about their program. They think excise-tax cuts at a time when business conditions are good aren't worth all the trouble this bill is likely to cause in Congress.

Congress wants to cut far more than the seven excises on the President's list.

On Capitol Hill, most guesses on the extent of excise trimming are about double $755,000,000. "Why discriminate in favor of these seven levies?" Congressmen will want to know. The Treasury is collecting over 50 excises and about 20 of these were started during the war, theoretically for the duration of the emergency.

But the more excises Congress cuts, the more increases Mr. Truman will want in other taxes. Congress will not swallow many of the revenue-raisers he's about to propose. In the end it will probably have just two choices: Either just cut excises and run the risk of a veto, or cut excises and boost the rates on corporate profits. This is an election year and corporations don't vote. A higher corporate tax would be simpler to draft, it would appeal to prolabor Congressmen and wouldn't hike the lawmakers' personal tax bills.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator said he thought there might be a loss of $1,000,000,000 resulting from repeal of the excise taxes. Has the Senator any estimate of how much of that $1,000,000,000 would be recovered through increased income-tax receipts? Certainly when an excise tax is paid three or four times over by three or four different people, as it is in the case of the transportation tax, that must materially affect the amount of income tax which those people pay.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is true.

Mr. AIKEN. There is bound to be considerable recovery from the loss of the excise taxes by way of increased income taxes which many people would pay.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that is true. I have heard it estimated that about one-third of any reduction would be recovered in additional income taxes. I do not know how accurate that estimate is. But unquestionably some of it would be recovered.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. KEM. Is it not true that repeal or reduction of excise taxes will also greatly stimulate business, and in that way increase the profits of business enterprise? The Senator from Delaware has already pointed out that the fact that a reduction or elimination of the excise taxes as expected by the people is causing goods to pile up on the shelves of merchants and manufacturers. If these taxes are eliminated or reduced, will not the increased prosperity go all the way down the line throughout our business system?

Mr. WILLIAMS. To a certain extent it will. Yet there is a limit beyond which we cannot go in reducing taxes just as there is a limit beyond which we cannot go in increasing taxes, without reaching the point of diminishing returns. That was my reason for voting in 1948 for a tax reduction plus the fact that even after the reduction we had a balanced budget. It resulted in a stimulation to business. The over-all net loss to the Government in 1948 by the tax reduction was not so large as the amount by which taxes were reduced. Some of it came back to the Treasury in the way of increased income taxes resulting from increased business.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I wonder if, in the course of his study of the tax situation, the Senator from Delaware has discovered how many persons are employed in handling and collecting the excise taxes, and what saving could be made in that field if we did not have to employ, let us say, several thousand persons and pay their expenses as employees of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Vermont has raised a very interesting point and it should work that way. But my experience is that the less work we give any of these agencies the more men they hire. In 1948 we took 7,000,000 taxpayers off the rolls. Yet the Treasury Department now has more employees on the pay roll than it ever had before in the history of the country; and at the same time it claims they do not have half enough employees. So instead of working out as it should, and as the Senator from Vermont pointed out, it works in directly the opposite manner.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. BUTLER. Is the Senator from Delaware aware of the fact that some of the taxes embodied in the amendment under discussion were definitely placed, not for the purpose of raising revenue, but for the purpose of discouraging the purchase of certain articles?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Nebraska is correct and I have stated there should be a study made of these taxes and some reductions made, although I do not think the floor of the United States Senate is the place to write a tax bill. That is the reason I voted as I did last July. I think the revision should have originated in the House after hearings had been held.

However, I wish to call attention to the fact that the reason Senate bill 3905 is on the calendar is because the deciding vote on reporting the bill was cast by the then Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. McGrath, who, at that time, was chairman of the Democratic National Committee. That is the reason it is here on the calendar. If it is a political question, it is a Democratic political question, because the chairman of the Democratic National Committee voted against the Democratic chairman [Mr. GEORGE] to report the bill to the floor.

I quite agree with the Senator from Illinois that we should follow orderly procedure on the floor, although I am not so concerned today as he is, because I remember it was only last year, when he himself signed a petition trying to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration of a bill, in order to bring that bill to the floor of the Senate. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary was at that time absent in Europe. What was then attempted is something which I understand has never before been done upon the floor of the United States Senate, yet the senior Senator from Illinois was the spearhead of that action. So, apparently, the question of following parliamentary procedure depends entirely upon how we feel concerning measures before the Senate.

Mr. President, as I stated before, I shall support the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN], although I am not sure at this moment how I shall vote on the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to make a short statement. I have been chairman of the Finance Committee for quite a long time. I have never been disposed to hold back any measure of merit, or one upon which any considerable number of Senators wished to vote. That is my record. I give the Senate my assurance that as soon as the complications involved in this particular matter can be ironed out with the opposite committee in the House, I shall then myself call up a bill to which a suitable amendment dealing with the excise taxes can be attached.

The question here involved is whether the majority party is to be allowed to function. If my friends on the other side of the aisle think they are playing good politics, please let me assume, for a moment, the role of a prophet, and say to them that they never were so sadly mistaken. The American people expect us to function in the normal way. There is a way by which legislation can be enacted. There are other ways which will impede and ultimately defeat the enactment of legislation. But for this motion, Mr. President, today I would already have been in conference with the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and with representatives of the Treasury in an effort to work out this problem in such a way that there would be some assurance that we could obtain effective action upon the excise taxes.

That is all I have to say, Mr. President. There has never been any disposition on my part to prevent a vote by the Senate on this issue. When this bill was reported from the Finance Committee, although I thought it inadvisable to report it, I said I would bring it up in the Senate, if possible. There is not a Senator here who does not know what we had to contend with last July and in August and September and October, up to the date of adjournment of that session of the Senate. We had before us such measures as the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Extension Act, the European aid program, and the North Atlantic Pact, followed by an appropriation to implement that pact. It was utterly impossible to bring this bill to the floor of the Senate then. The bill was called on about three or four successive calendar calls, but each time objection was made. I could not move to have the Senate take it up then; with the parliamentary situation what it was at that time, it was impossible to do so.

If we have any respect for a parliamentary system of government, under which responsibility must rest upon those who have the direction of the parliamentary body, I do not believe those of us on this side of the aisle, at least, can afford to do anything but sustain the position taken in this case by the majority leader.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I have heard a great deal of discussion today about orderly procedure. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Georgia whether the motion of the Senator from Washington violates any rule of order of either the Senate or the House of Representatives?

Mr. GEORGE. No; I do not think it violates any rule of order. But I have never seen any responsible movement made to restrict the authority of the chairman of a committee and to disregard the order of business as fixed by a majority leader, unless there was a disposition on the part of those in charge not to permit the Senate to act upon such matters.

Mr. President, the program does not suit me altogether. However, I am not on the policy committee. I do not fix the order in which the measures are presented to the Senate. Undoubtedly some measures which will be presented will be ones on which I do not wish to vote affirmatively, and on which I shall not vote affirmatively. But there is no possible occasion for any Senator to say that the chairman of the Finance Committee has acted in bad faith or is now acting in bad faith. Unless that situation were to arise, as a responsible Member of this body, I would never move to have the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill which came from a committee of which I was not a member.

I am not critical of any Senator as having violated a rule of the Senate. Nevertheless, there is such a thing as propriety and there is such a thing as orderly procedure. If Senators wish to obtain results, they must observe those rules, as they should be observed everywhere. We cannot force results by any such tactics.

Mr. CAIN. Mr. President, I should like to make only a brief comment for, I think, primarily, the information of the majority leader, the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], and, in part, for the information of the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

A few minutes ago the majority leader expressed some surprise that a Senator would offer a motion which would test the feeling of the Senate of the United States on a pressing public question. He suggested that certainly during the Eightieth Congress, when the Republicans were in the majority, no such motion on any subject had ever been offered by any member of his party. I should only like to point out—and to ask the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois to tell me the difference—that on June 15, 1948, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] made a motion, in opposition to what was then the program as laid down by the majority party, that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of the oleomargarine tax-repeal bill. Some 57 Senators, both Republicans and Democrats, thought it proper to vote "yea," so as to bring that question before the Senate for consideration, over and against the so-called orderly procedure, to which the Senator from Illinois has so quaintly addressed himself this afternoon. I notice, merely from the record, that among those then voting "yea"—meaning to say, "Yes, let us tell the majority leader that we want to take action on the measure," which was one which the majority leader and those on his policy committee thought should be delayed a little while—was the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS]. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] was absent on that occasion; but it was announced, in his name, that had he been present, he, too, would have voted in favor of the immediate consideration of the oleomargarine tax-repeal question, an important question. Fifty-seven of the 96 Senators said, in effect, "Let us consider it"; and their action did, as should have been the case, upset the program that certain other Senators thought should be undertaken at the moment.

I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that we seek only to test this question. It is time to tell America who is and who is not in favor of doing away with war excise taxes. We have spent a great deal of time talking about it. Let us now proceed to call the roll. If there are Senators on both sides of the aisle who wish to do something about the wartime excise taxes, that is precisely what we are Senators for. If a majority of us wish to vote "yea" on any measure which we think is good for the United States of America, let me say, with all respect for the senior Senator from Illinois, the majority leader, that is what we should promptly do. I am anxious to determine the wishes of individual Senators, in order that the Senator from Georgia, the chairman of the Finance Committee, may discover the degree of interest within the Senate on the question of beginning to get rid of taxes which have outworn both their usefulness and their moral justification.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3905.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, since I have been in the Senate I have never been more embarrassed than I am at the present time. When the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee states to us now, as a matter of good faith, that he will do everything he can to bring this matter before us under other vehicles or in different ways, that is 100 percent with me, and I think it should be with everyone else.

I find myself in this position: I have told my constituents repeatedly that I would take hold of any and every horn which presented itself to get many of the excise taxes reduced or eliminated. So I find myself embarrassed, as between my pledge to my constituents and the great respect and desire which I have to cooperate closely with the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee.

Under all these circumstances, Mr. President, I think I must vote for the motion to bring up this measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3905.

Mr. CAIN, Mr. HENDRICKSON, and other Senators requested the yeas and nays, and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that no business has been transacted since the last quorum call was had, and therefore a quorum call is not now in order.

The yeas and nays have been demanded and ordered on the question of agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Washington, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll; and Mr. AIKEN voted in the affirmative when his name was called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state that, under the advice of the parliamentary clerk, the mere ordering of the yeas and nays is the transaction of business which would justify a quorum call. The Chair was under the impression that nothing had been done since the last quorum call, except the making of speeches, which, under the parliamentary rules of the Senate, is not the transaction of business in that sense.

Under the circumstances, the Chair feels that, in view of the suggestion of the absence of a quorum, the quorum call should be proceeded with.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, let me ask what happens to my vote in that event. Do I get two votes?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will get another one, but it will not be added to this one.

The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Hendrickson	McMahon
Anderson	Hill	Magnuson
Benton	Hoey	Martin
Brewster	Holland	Maybank
Bricker	Humphrey	Millikin
Bridges	Hunt	Murray

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MYERS. I announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] are absent on official business as members of a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Works, holding hearings on various flood-control and public-works projects in the State of New Mexico.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] are absent on important public business.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN] is paired on this vote with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY]. If present and voting, the Senator from Kentucky would vote "nay," and the Senator from Wisconsin would vote "yea."

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is paired on this vote with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE]. If present and voting, the Senator from Texas would vote "nay," and the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea."

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] is paired on this vote with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON]. If present and voting, the Senator from Rhode Island would vote "nay," and the Senator from Michigan would vote "yea."

The Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] is paired on this vote with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Florida would vote "nay," and the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea."

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] is paired on this vote with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE]. If present and voting, the Senator from Mississippi would vote "nay," and the Senator from Nevada would vote "yea."

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] is paired on this vote with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT]. If present and voting, the Senator from Maryland would vote "nay," and the Senator from South Dakota would vote "yea."

The Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], who is unavoidably detained on official business, would vote "nay" if present.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER], who is absent by leave of the Senate, is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER]. If present and voting, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HICKENLOOPER] would vote "yea," and the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] would vote "nay."

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE], who is necessarily absent, is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS]. If present and voting, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] would vote "yea," and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS] would vote "nay."

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], who is absent on official business, is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. If present and voting, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE] would vote "yea," and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] would vote "nay."

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON], who is necessarily absent, is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN]. If present and voting, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] would vote "yea," and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] would vote "nay."

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] is necessarily absent. If present and voting, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY] would vote "yea."

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY], who is absent on official business, is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN]. If present and voting, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WILEY] would vote "yea," and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHAPMAN] would vote "nay."

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT], who is necessarily absent, is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. If present and voting, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] would vote "yea," and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] would vote "nay."

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] is necessarily absent.

So Mr. CAIN's motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3905) to amend section 3121 of the Internal Revenue Code was rejected.

AMENDMENT OF THE HATCH ACT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1243) to amend the Hatch Act.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendments have not yet been disposed of, and, therefore, the Senator's amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I should like to talk approximately 2 minutes, in order to explain my amendment. I hope the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] will accept it. I ask that it may be read for the information of the Senate. I think it is an amendment which the Senator will accept.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order to offer it at this time.

Mr. McCARTHY. I ask only that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 3. Section 612 of title XVIII, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Whoever places or causes to be placed in any post office or authorized depository for mail matter, any such publication, card, pamphlet, circular, poster, dodger, advertisement, writing, or other statements which violates any provision of the foregoing paragraph, to be sent or delivered by the Post Office Department, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both."

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, the amendment simply makes it a criminal offense to mail, in a political campaign, any material which does not contain the name of the individual who authorizes or pays for the particular material. I shall not dwell on it at any great length. I know that all Members of the Senate have at some time been the subject of attack, and I think, in fairness to the voters and to the candidates, we should do everything possible to make sure that when anyone issues any campaign material it shall be made very clear who is doing the issuing and who is paying for it. My amendment merely provides that if anyone places in the mail any such unsigned material it is a violation of postal laws and regulations, and he will be liable to a $5,000 maximum fine or 2 years in the penitentiary, or both.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, it so happens that the chairman of the Committee on Rules and Administration is not a lawyer. I do not know what the effect of this amendment would be. I thought, on the face of it, it would be entirely proper, but it seems to me that if we impose a $5,000 fine on someone, the Judiciary Committee should first pass upon it, rather than for the Senator to ask me to accept the amendment on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not object to having a vote on it. I have talked to a number of Senators, and up to this time every Senator with whom I have talked is in favor of it. I have no objection to putting it to a vote, although I thought the Senator might care to take the amendment to conference. If he thinks that a $5,000 fine is too great, it may be cut down, and if a 2-year term in a penitentiary is too long, it might be cut down. If the Senator does not want to take the responsibility of accepting the amendment, I shall ask for a vote on it at the proper time.

Mr. HAYDEN. The amendment is not really germane to the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. KILGORE. I am curious to know whether the amendment refers to matter in newspapers.

Mr. McCARTHY. No; it would not refer to matter in a newspaper. There is a provision in practically all State laws, at least there is in my State, and I think there is such a provision in the law of the Senator's State, covering newspapers. There is also a provision in the Federal law covering newspapers. My amendment merely provides that if certain matter is placed in the post office it is a violation of postal laws and regulations.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Is it not really a question for each State to determine in connection with its Corrupt Practices Act and its Election Code? I know there is such a law in Massachusetts. It would seem to me that this is a question for the States, and if we begin to place such a provision in a Federal statute we shall bring about a dispute between the States and the Federal Government as to what is legal and what is not legal.

Mr. McCARTHY. Section 612 of title XVIII of the United States Code already covers this subject. It provides for a fine of $1,000 and for a jail sentence for anyone putting out advertising or any material which does not contain the name of the sponsor, but there is no provision in the Federal law which makes it a criminal offense to send such material through the mail.

As to whether it is a matter the States should cover, I frankly do not know. There is a question of how much power a State has in dealing with the election of the President and Members of the House and Senate. We are not establishing any new precedent when we have the Federal Government deal with a particular problem. We are merely tightening up the law to make it more difficult for persons to send through the mail unsigned and anonymous material.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Does the Senator from Wisconsin understand that the States have any jurisdiction over the type of material which goes through the mail? The States would not have any authority to determine the type of material which may go through the United States mail.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think the Senator from Vermont makes an excellent point, which is an answer to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL]. For the benefit of Senators who did not hear the Senator from Vermont, let me say he has pointed out that the States have no power whatsoever to pass any laws regulating the type of material which can go through the post office. Only the Federal Government can do that.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCARTHY. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. The question of the use of the United States mails is worrying a great many people. In a recent campaign in which I participated I tried very hard to find the source of certain material which was sent through the mail and which was extremely damaging to me. It was not subject to the States laws applying to the publication of advertisements. If the Senator from Wisconsin has anything making it unlawful for persons to send that sort of material through the mails, sometimes containing a fake campaign address, which is made to appear to come from the candidate himself, which it does not, he has my blessing.

Mr. McCARTHY. I know of many other States which have the same problem. Sometimes it is not entirely a case of being protected from the opposition. Sometimes we must be protected from our overzealous friends who take it upon themselves to send out campaign material.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the first committee amendment to House bill 1243.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 2, after "mission", to insert by unanimous vote."

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CORDON. I have in preparation an amendment which I desire to offer which would be in lieu of section 1 of the bill as it is before the Senate, which contains several committee amendments.

If the committee amendments should be agreed to, would it then be in order to strike the entire section 1, and insert a substitute in lieu thereof?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would be in order, after all perfecting amendments to the section had been disposed of.

Mr. CORDON. Before considering the committee amendments, and because I believe that as soon as the amendments are taken up, there may be a possibility of getting a substitution without too long delay, I should like to present the substance of an amendment which I intend to offer.

I may say, in preface to my explanation, that I am in sympathy with the purpose of the proposed legislation, and I believe, Mr. President, that the present penalty for a minor violation of section 9 of the Hatch Act may in many instances be too severe. I think that somewhere there should be lodged discretion to impose some type of penalty less than absolute discharge from employment. On the other hand, I agree with the Senators who feel that the bill, as reported, provides no standard whatever to guide or circumscribe the actions of the Civil Service Commission. I think some standards should be provided. I am in agreement with the feeling that every possible safeguard should be thrown around authority granted to an administrative body as distinguished from a judicial tribunal.

The amendment which I shall propose will be, substantially, that section 9 of the present act be amended by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (b) and adding certain provisos and paragraphs, the substance of which will be that persons who are found guilty of violating the section shall be dismissed from the service of the United States, and so on, as now provided, but adding a proviso that if the Civil Service Commission, after hearing, shall find by unanimous vote that such violation was not willful, a lesser penalty may be imposed; then a provision that in no case shall the penalty be less than 90 days suspension from duty without pay. That would mean, if that portion of the amendment were adopted, that there would be established a standard to guide the Commission, namely, an affirmative finding by a unanimous vote that the violation was not willful.

If my understanding of the criminal law is correct, the term "willful" comprehends, first, a knowledge of the wrongfulness of the act, and, second, an intent to perform the act despite the knowledge that it is wrong.

Mr. President, there will follow in the amendment which I intend to propose, with respect to consideration of cases where dismissal has already occurred, a provision that reconsideration may be had upon request to the Commission, and that in that event there must also be a finding that the original violation was not willful, in which case the remedy provided in the pending bill may be applied, namely, that the individual involved may be subject to reemployment by the Government.

There would follow then, Mr. President, in a separate paragraph, a provision requiring the Commission at the end of each month to report to the Senate and to the House of Representatives the names, addresses, and nature of employment of all persons with respect to whom action had been taken by the Commission under this section, together with a statement of the facts upon which action had been taken, and the penalty imposed.

Another paragraph, which I believe should be in any law of this character, would provide that the proceedings of all hearings should be transcribed and the transcript should be held available to any committee of either House upon request.

In substance, the amendment, which I hope will be on the floor within a very few minutes, will, first, carry the present penalty of expulsion from service, but, second, will also carry provision that where the violation was not willful, consideration may be given by the Civil Service Commission to the imposition of a lesser penalty, with a minimum penalty, which in any event must be imposed.

Then, in order that the Congress and the country may be apprised of what takes place in connection with this particular provision of section 9 of the Hatch Act, a provision is added that the Congress shall be kept currently informed of all the facts, and shall have access to the testimony itself upon which the Commission acted. That will have two results. It will serve to keep the Commission always conscious of the fact that its actions are subject to careful consideration and appraisal at all times by the Congress, and it will give to the Congress an opportunity, by studying the reports, to effect any correction which it may find necessary in the act as it will then be on the books.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. CORDON. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I am very much interested in the passage of the bill, and I have no objection at all to getting reports on the cases arising, but I wish to raise with my distinguished colleague from Oregon, the question of the construction of the word "willful" he is proposing to insert.

The Senator from Oregon is a very fine lawyer.

Mr. CORDON. The Senator thanks the Senator from Virginia for his generosity.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The Senator, of course, knows that the courts have uniformly held that a man intends the necessary and probable consequences of his voluntary acts. So, if we wrote the word "willful" into the law, a man would have to prove that he was too drunk to know what he was doing, or had no will, in order to escape the very heavy penalty sought to be written into the bill. If the Senate agreed to the Senator's amendment and the word "willful" were written into the law, we might as well leave the law as it stands. I can not see that we would be getting anywhere at all in taking care of the clear hardship cases, when the equivalent of a fine of $50,000 could be imposed for a very minor infraction of the election laws.

Take the case cited in the report, of a postal employee who lacked only 6 months of reaching the retirement age, who wanted to help a friend with whom he had served for some 29 years, who had retired and was a candidate for office. He took a petition and got 2 or 3 signatures, and he was dismissed and lost his retirement pay and all his benefits, and was forever excluded from Government employment. But that penalty would still be possible under the proposed amendment because he could not say, "I did not know how to circulate the petition. I did not know my friend was running for office. I did not know what I was doing."

If the Senator really desires to perfect the bill, in my opinion he should eliminate the provision of his amendment to which I have just referred, and leave the provision which calls for the reports, so that Congress may know what cases had been handled, and just what had been done.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, but I utterly disagree with his position with reference to the definition of the term "willful" as it is used in the criminal law. The term "willful" as used in the criminal law—and I am sure I could bring to the Senate floor a handful of decisions on the subject, with the weight of opinion throughout the United States in criminal case decisions—first, imports a knowledge on the part of the individual that the thing he does is unlawful, and it also imports a guilty intent to commit the unlawful act. Both are included in the term "willful."

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. CORDON. I am happy to yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. In the Senator's course on torts he, of course, remembers the firecracker case, in which a man threw a firecracker about to explode at the feet of another man, who picked it up and in trying to get rid of it threw it toward a second man, and it blew up in his face. The last man who threw it was not intending to blow up the man toward whom he threw it. He was acting under an emergency.

Let us consider a traffic violation. One may be temporarily looking one way and drive through a red light. The law is violated, but it is not willfully done, because the driver did not notice the red light.

But a difference exists between "willful," as applied to a violation of the election laws, and as applied to negligence cases, because in an election case a man cannot say or plead that he did not know what he was doing. If he did not know what he was doing his act would still be willful. If I circulated a petition accidentally, did not intend to do it, and did not willfully do it, but I simply circulated it, the defense that the act was not willful would not stand up for a minute. We are dealing with a case in which someone solicits the vote of another. He hands out election cards. He circulates petitions. He goes to a meeting and stands up in that meeting and perhaps he says, "The candidate is my candidate. I hope everybody will vote for him." It cannot be pleaded that such action was not willful.

I say, with all due deference to my friend from Oregon, that when dealing with election laws there is no such thing as not intending or not being willful in what one does. But there is a difference in degree in what is done.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I think it would serve no particular purpose to continue the discussion between my friend and myself, inasmuch as we do not agree. I am sure I cannot convince him, and I am equally certain that in this instance he cannot convince me. I regret that I must leave it in the end to the Senate to determine.

I call the Senate's attention to the fact, however, that the term "willful" is used in many instances in the criminal law. It is used in many instances in cases where technically there is no crime in the sense that crime must exist only when there is a statutory provision and penalty attached. But it is used in cases of this character where, while the penalty is not imprisonment or assessment of a fine, it nevertheless is a statutory penalty for affirmative action, with the light of knowledge of the action an indispensable part of the offense, and in this instance I feel that the protection of the employees will be had if the language be used as indicated.

Mr. President, I do not care to impose further on the Senate's time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first committee amendment on page 2, line 2, after the word "Commission," to insert "by unanimous vote."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In line 4, after the word "in", it is proposed to insert "no case shall the penalty be less than a fifteen-day suspension from duty without pay: And provided further, That in."

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, earlier in the debate I asked that the words "fifteen-day" be changed to "thirty-day." I understood the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] agreed to accept that amendment. I believe a 15-day suspension is too small. I think a 30-day provision would be more fair. I offer that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the committee amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "fifteen-day" and insert "thirty-day."

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I wish to amend that by striking out the word "thirty" and inserting the word "ninety." I offer that as an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment is not in order. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is an amendment to the committee amendment, and the Senator's proposed amendment would be in the third degree.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona if there would be a willingness to get together on the figure, say at 60?

Mr. HAYDEN. If the two Senators on the other side can agree on 60, I will accept it.

Mr. CAPEHART. I agree.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts modifies his amendment so as to make it read "60" instead of "30." The question is on the modified amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was on page 2, line 10, after the word "find" to insert "by a unanimous vote."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on the same page, after line 14, to insert a new section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. Section 16 of such act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 16. Whenever, in any municipality, county, or political subdivision of a county in the immediate vicinity of the National Capital in the State of Maryland or the State of Virginia, 10 percent or more of the qualified voters are persons employed by the Government of the United States or by the municipal government of the District of Columbia or, in any municipality, county, or political subdivision of a county of any State, the majority of the qualified voters are persons employed by the Government of the United States, it shall be lawful for any person to whom the provisions of this act are applicable, and who is a resident of such municipality, county, or political subdivision of a county, to participate actively as an individual, candidate, or manager in elections for offices which are filled only by the voters of such municipality, county, or political subdivision of a county, including participation in primaries, conventions, caucuses, or mass meetings sponsored by political parties and including participation as a candidate seeking office as the nominee of any such party."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That completes the committee amendments. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. As I understand, the Senator from Oregan [Mr. CORDON] desires to offer a substitute for section 1, but that should not prevent us from considering section 2 of the bill which is in the nature of an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Arizona that that has already been agreed to. All committee amendments have been agreed to.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for section 1 of the committee bill, as amended, and ask that it be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Beginning with line 3, on page 1, it is proposed to strike out down to and including all of line 14, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That section 9 of the act entitled "An act to prevent pernicious political activities," approved August 2, 1939, is hereby amended by changing the period at the end of subsection b to a colon and adding the following: "Provided, That if the Civil Service Commission after hearing shall find, by unanimous vote, that such violation was not willful, a lesser penalty shall be imposed by the Commission: Provided further, That in no case shall the penalty be less than 60 days' suspension without pay: Provided further, That in the case of any person who has heretofore been removed from the service under the provisions of this section, the Commission shall upon request reopen and reconsider the record in such case. If it shall find by a unanimous vote that the violation committed was not willful it shall issue an order revoking the restriction against reemployment in the position from which removed, or in any other position for which he may be qualified.

"(c) At the end of each calendar month the Commission shall report to the Senate and the House of Representatives the names, addresses, and nature of employment of all persons with respect to whom action has been taken by the Commission under the terms of this section, with a statement of the facts upon which action was taken, and the penalty imposed.

"(d) Testimony in all hearings had pursuant to the terms of this section shall be transcribed and made available to either the Senate or the House of Representatives upon the request of any committee thereof."

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I desire to modify the amendment in one respect. I modify my amendment in the third line of the proviso, after the word "penalty", by striking out "shall" and inserting "may."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator may modify his amendment.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. CORDON. I yield.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Would not the word "willful," as the Senator uses it in his amendment, be clarified if he were to add the words "with malice aforethought"?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Virginia, who are able lawyers, that the subcommittee which reported the bill to the full committee consisted of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL], and the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND]. The Senator from California is no longer a member of the committee, but the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] is. They will be the conferees on the bill. They are three very able lawyers. I should like to ask the two Senators who have been discussing the matter if they agree that when the bill goes to conference we can trust those lawyers to straighten out the difficulty about "willful." If we can come to an accord in that regard, the matter can be taken care of in conference.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I shall not seriously object. I want to see the bill passed today. But I do not want it passed without registering my belief that if the word "willful" is retained, it will not apply to every offense that is committed, although a strict construction of it might make it difficult to find an exception. Perhaps in conference the conferees can change the wording to make that clear. Otherwise I hope the Senator from Oregon will agree with me that it is not his intention to make it apply to every offense.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President, I have endeavored to make that clear. I have no pride of authorship. I had hoped that we could provide a sound procedure, one which would give protection to the orderly processes of government, on the one hand, and, on the other, would give a break to the man in Government employ who has made an unintentional mistake. I think the language accomplishes that objective. Yet, if better language can be found, I would be the first to adopt it.

Mr. HAYDEN. I like the idea, Mr. President, of reports to the Congress with respect to these cases. That appeals to me. I am inclined, therefore, to accept the substitute offered by the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CORDON] as a substitute for section 1 of the bill, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I call up my amendment, and ask to have it stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following new section:

SEC. 3. Section 612 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Whoever places or causes to be placed in any post office or authorized depository for mail matter, any such publication, card, pamphlet, circular, poster, dodger, advertisement, writing, or other statement which violates any provision of the foregoing paragraph, to be sent or delivered by the Post Office Department, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both."

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President——

Mr. GILLETTE rose.

Mr. McCARTHY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GILLETTE. I want the floor in my own right before the amendment is voted on.

Mr. McCARTHY. I have not yielded the floor.

Mr. President, in case there are any Senators present who were not present at the time when I previously discussed my amendment, I will say that the amendment simply makes it a criminal offense—and the penalty is set forth—to put in the mails during a campaign, campaign material which does not show the source thereof, who is paying for it, and who authorized it. Practically all the States have laws making it a criminal offense to circulate such matter. However, the States have no authority to pass laws providing that it shall be an offense to pass such matter through the United States mails. In that respect, I think there is a gap in our Federal laws, and I believe we should fill the gap.

There may be some question as to whether the penalty provided by the amendment is too severe, whether $5,000 is too large a fine or whether imprisonment for 2 years is too great a penalty. I suggest that the amendment be adopted and taken to conference; and if the conferees feel that the fine is too large or the penalty is too great, they can be reduced.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have no objection to the purpose the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin has in mind; in fact, in the past I have sponsored proposed legislation of this kind before the Senate, but unsuccessfully, I may say. But I should like to say to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin and to the other Members of the Senate that the pending measure is not the place to which to attach amendatory matter of this kind. The pending measure has for its purpose the lessening of a drastic penalty which would be imposed by the Civil Service Commission under regulatory authority conferred upon it by the Hatch Act. The proposal the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin has presented in his amendment is amendatory of the Criminal Code, and has no reference to the Hatch Act or to the regulatory matter or authority of the Civil Service Commission, as sought to be covered by the pending measure. The portion of the Criminal Code which the amendment of the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin would amend is a definite fixing of what constitutes a crime and of the penalties for committing it.

Section 612 of the Criminal Code, which the Senator from Wisconsin seeks to amend by having his amendment added to the pending measure, provides that—

Whoever willfully publishes or distributes any card, pamphlet, circular, poster, dodger, advertisement, writing, or other statement relating to or concerning any person who has publicly declared his intention to seek the office of President, or Vice President of the United States, or Senator or Representative in, or Delegate or Resident Commissioner to Congress, in a primary, general, or special election, or convention of a political party, or has caused or permitted his intention to do so to be publicly declared, which does not contain the names of the persons, associations, committees, and corporations responsible for the publication or distribution of the same, and the names of the officers of each such association, committe, or corporation shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 1 year, or both.

That provision of the Criminal Code establishes as a crime the distribution, under those circumstances, of campaign documents which do not carry the name of the sponsor, and imposes a penalty of $1,000. On the other hand, the Senator by his amendment, if I correctly understood the amendment as it has been presented, seeks to change the penalty to one of $5,000—in other words, a greatly increased penalty—for merely depositing such material in a post-office box or in a mail box.

Mr. President, it is altogether too vital, too intricate, and too judicial a matter—to attempt to amend the Criminal Code by adding an amendment of this kind to a regulatory measure which merely goes to authority delegated to a commission of the United States Government.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. I submit to the Senator that there is nothing intricate about the amendment. It simply provides that if a person sends such material through the mails, he will be in violation of the postal regulations.

We are now proposing to enact, as an amendment to the Hatch Act, a measure lightening the severity of the provisions of the Hatch Act, which has to do with elections. By the pending measure we propose to make it easier for people to violate the Hatch Act. I think all of us agree that it is improper for anyone to issue material in a campaign without showing the source of the material. In other words, anyone who has something of a derogatory nature to say about a Senator or candidate for Senator in a campaign should be required to sign his name to such material. We know that in the last campaign Senators had some very unpleasant experiences; we know that in various parts of the Nation there are some unscrupulous persons who do not hesitate to write libelous articles about candidates, but do not have the courage to sign their names to such articles.

This amendment simply provides that such persons, if they pass such material through the mails, will be guilty of a crime.

The $5,000 fine provided by the amendment is to be the maximum fine, not the minimum. The judge trying the case will, of course, have discretion in that matter. The provision of imprisonment for 2 years is to be the maximum penalty, not the minimum.

If the amendment is adopted and taken to conference, and if the conferees believe the penalties provided by the amendment are too severe and that it should not be added to the measure we are now considering, of course, they can agree to a conference report providing for the elimination of this amendment. But certainly there is no rule to prevent us from passing such a very sensible measure.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, let me repeat what I have already said, namely, I have no particular issue at all with the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin in regard to the goal he seeks to attain, because there have been scores and scores of instances of the abuses to which he has referred, not only within my own personal experience, but in the experience of many other persons. I may say that I happened to be chairman of the Campaign Expenditures Committee in 1940, and we had literally hundreds of complaints about abuses such as those the Senator from Wisconsin seeks to reach by his amendment, abuses which should be stopped.

So I would join with the Senator from Wisconsin in favor of an amendatory provision. If the present section 612 of the Criminal Code is not sufficient, I shall join the Senator from Wisconsin in seeking to secure its amendment.

Again I say the question of germaneness arises here. The question now before us is that of seeking to minimize a drastic penalty imposed by the Civil Service Commission, under delegated authority. However, the Senator's amendment would amend the Criminal Code.

So, Mr. President, I hope the amendment will not be adopted as an amendment to the pending measure, because certainly the amendment is not in accordance with the legislation we are seeking to enact at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. [Putting the question.]

The "noes" appear to have it.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I have just been informed that there is to be a reception this evening for one of the Members of the Senate, and of course Senators wish to attend it. Some Senators, I am informed, already have left the Chamber for that purpose, on the assumption that no record vote would be taken or no quorum call had tonight.

So I ask unanimous consent that my suggestion of the absence of a quorum may be withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator's suggestion of the absence of a quorum will be withdrawn.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, I ask for a division on the question of the adoption of the amendment.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments to be proposed, the question is on the endorsement of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

The bill (H. R. 1243) was passed.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, request a conference thereon with the House of Representatives, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. STENNIS, Mr. GILLETTE, and Mr. SCHOEPPEL conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CORDON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona wish to have the bill printed with the Senate amendments to the bill numbered?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, of course the amendments the Senate has adopted simply provide for striking out certain House language and inserting certain new language. Nevertheless, I ask that the bill be printed with the Senate amendments numbered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EQUAL RIGHTS FOR MEN AND WOMEN—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 119, Senate Joint Resolution 25.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the joint resolution by title.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 25) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to equal rights for men and women.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL JUDGESHIPS—LETTER FROM PEYTON FORD, ASSISTANT TO THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, TO SENATOR KNOWLAND

Mr. KNOWLAND. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD a letter I have received from Mr. Peyton Ford, the Assistant to the Attorney General, giving certain statistical information on Federal judgeships.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JANUARY 12, 1950.

Hon. WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: With further reference to your letter of August 24, addressed to the Attorney General, making certain inquiries concerning Federal judges, the information you have requested is set forth below:

1. Total number of Federal judges having life appointments, including 35 who are retired: 308.

2. Total number of present incumbent judges who have been appointed since the close of 1932, to include—

(a) United States	213
(b) Territories	24
(c) Lower courts of the District of Columbia	14
Total	251

3. Total number of Republicans appointed to judgeships since the close of 1932, to include—

(a) United States	21
(b) Territories	7
(c) Lower courts of the District of Columbia	2
Total	30

4. The number and names of the Republican judges appointed since 1933 to the Federal appeals courts: 7.

James M. Proctor, United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

D. Lawrence Groner, Chief Justice, United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

Harris Brigham Chase, second circuit.
Robert P. Patterson, second circuit.
William Clark, third circuit.
Wayne G. Borah, fifth circuit.
Walter G. Lindley, seventh circuit.

5. Total number of Federal judicial vacancies created by act of Congress since March 1933: 91.

Relative to the foregoing statistics, the following is also noted:

1. Total number of Federal judges having life appointments as of March 4, 1921: 167.
(a) Number who were Republicans, 83.
(b) Number who were Democrats, 79.
(c) Unknown affiliation, 5.

2. Total number of Federal judges receiving life appointments between 1921 and 1933: 214.
(a) Number who were Republicans, 191.
(b) Number who were Democrats, 20.
(c) Unkown affiliation, 3.

3. Total number of Federal judges having life appointments as of March 4, 1933: 231.
(a) Number who were Republicans, 172.
(b) Number who were Democrats, 57.
(c) Unkown affiliation, 2.

4. Total number of Federal judges receiving life appointments between 1933 and 1950: 289.
(a) Number who were Republicans, 17.
(b) Number who were Democrats, 272.

5. Total number of Federal judges having life appointments as of January 10, 1950: 308.
(a) Number who were Republicans, 84.
(b) Number who were Democrats, 224.

Hence, it is observed that there were apparently more Republicans than Democrats holding life appointments at the end of the last Democratic administration, and that there is approximately the same proportion of Republicans holding life appointments today as there were Democrats holding life appointments at the end of the last Republican administration, that is, approximately one-third of the total number of Federal judges holding life appointments at the respective times.

Yours sincerely,

PEYTON FORD,
The Assistant to the Attorney General.

PREFERENCE ACCORDED FOREIGN MERCHANDISE

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, the Government has started this week the purchase of a number of pork products, under the terms of our farm legislation, in order to maintain a reasonable price to producers. The program is strictly according to law, and is one which I support heartily. Without such a support program the prices of hogs might go down to disastrously low levels.

Not all the surplus hogs come from American farms, however. A substantial proportion of our market surplus is the result of the importation of Polish hams, which started a few months ago, and which has now reached a rate of hundreds of thousands of pounds a month. Our price-support policy, of course, encourages imports of Polish hams. The Government may not actually purchase at import any Polish hams, but it clears the way for the Polish ham to be imported by holding the domestic price up, and by taking part of the domestic hams off the market. Tariff rates are negligible as a result of substantial tariff reductions and foreign devaluation. This development must be pleasing to our State Department, since administration leaders have been pleading for increases in imports for some time. Recently they have even attacked our traditional policy of the Government's buying for our representatives abroad diplomatic products from our own producers. It is getting so that a citizen who prefers to buy products made in America is shamed by those who prefer to buy abroad, even from countries dominated by the Communists.

A glaring example of this has come to my attention. I call it to the attention of Senators, not because of any substantial injury that is occurring in the State of Nebraska but because it indicates the present policy of the State Department.

The United States produces as fine a chinaware as any country. It can produce sufficient quantities for our consumption at a very fair and reasonable price. It cannot produce average chinaware as cheaply as some countries, where wage rates and living standards are one-third, one-fifth, or one-eighth those of this country. Import duties have been reduced, and devaluation has aided the foreign producer. Unemployment, the cancellation of orders, and a slowing down of domestic production is occurring.

In the face of this situation it might be expected that the domestic chinaware industry could hope for some relief from the State Department. No such relief has been granted, however. On the contrary, the State Department has added insult to injury by decreeing that even our own embassies abroad shall use German chinaware rather than American chinaware.

I have in my hand articles from reputable publications that reveal this situation. They indicate that the purchases of German chinaware were made without even giving American producers an opportunity to bid for the business. They were negotiated secretly with the favored representative of a German manufacturing firm. The deals that have already been made were quite substantial. Over $280,000 was the cost of just the first batch.

At this point I desire to read two very short articles which appeared in the Retailing Daily. The first is entitled "United States Embassies to Dine from German China—State Department Contracts for Dinnerware Through New York Firm." It was written by John T. Norman, and reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, September 26.—Bypassing domestic chinaware manufacturers, the State Department has completed two contracts—and soon will negotiate a third—for the purchase in Germany of gold-trimmed dinnerware for use in American embassies and consulates throughout the world, Fairchild News Service learned today.

One contract, dated May 16, 1949, was made by the State Department with William Graham, identified as president of the Royal York China Co., New York City, for the purchase of 100 sets of dinnerware—service for 12—for 259,820 German marks. Another contract, completed August 23 this year, covered the following:

Fifty sets of service for 12, priced at 129,-910 German marks.

Fifteen sets of service for 24, priced at 68,648.25 German marks.

Fifteen sets of service for 36, priced at 124,459 5 Germans marks.

Reserve stocks, priced at 17,636.3 German marks.

THIRD CONTRACT

Officials of the State Department's division handling foreign building operations said that the third contract with Mr. Graham would be about the same size as the August 23 order. At the current official rate of exchange, the German west mark still is worth 30 cents, although Government fiscal experts expect that the west mark will be devalued shortly to bring its value into line with other European currencies.

In each case, it was explained, the contracts with Mr. Graham specify that payment shall be made in west German marks, rather than dollars, for the chinaware manufactured for this Government by the Hutchenreuther China Co. in Germany.

The second article is headed, "State Department turns to foreign supplies for dinnerware," is dated Washington, September 29, and reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, September 29.—The State Department has turned to foreign suppliers to get fancy, gold-trimmed dinnerware for United States embassies and consulates throughout the world, because blocked currencies owned by this Government abroad can be used for purchase of everything from tableware to real estate, Government officials explained today.

Allen Donaldson, of the State Department's Foreign Building Operations Division, refused to explain, however, how contracts were made with one New York businessman for large purchases of official State Department dinnerware, manufactured by the Hutchenreuther China Co. in Germany.

"The reason why we didn't advertise this thing," he said, "was because we didn't want commission men to come down here from New York."

Mr. Donaldson said that further details on business arrangements between his office and William Graham, of the Royal York China Co., New York—under which Mr. Graham already has received two contracts to supply dinnerware to the State Department and soon may get a third contract—will have to come from Mr. Graham.

At first the excuse offered was that these 200 sets of chinaware could be purchased more cheaply abroad. After being criticized severely for these purchases, however, the State Department made some further explanations. "The orders were not actually placed because of lower prices," the Department said, "but because certain laws permitted them to utilize foreign credits." The letter from the Department to a representative of the domestic chinaware industry went on to say very frankly that the program "is being vigorously pursued in the public interest." Further on, the State Department letter states that no dollars have been expended for this purpose, and promises that "when the buildings and furnishings program is again on a dollar basis the Department will make domestic purchases of American materials and furnishings."

The letter goes on to claim there was nothing secret about the foreign deals. It seems they just did not tell anyone about them. It has been proved to my satisfaction that no bids were called for. There were no advertisements, and no domestic supplier was approached. The whole arrangement reached the light only as the result of the initiative of an alert reporter.

Mr. President, I wonder what high officials of a foreign government think when, at an embassy function, they discover that our Government thinks so little of our own chinaware that they purchase and use chinaware from other countries. I wonder what foreign governments would think if we suggested to them that their embassies use chinaware made in this country. It happens that I have here an exchange of letters which I should like to read, which show very clearly what the British thought when such a suggestion was made to them. They laughed. I am reading from a letter addressed to the British Embassy by the executive secretary of the Vitrified China Association, Inc., Washington, D. C., and the reply thereto. The letters reads as follows:

VITRIFIED CHINA ASSOCIATION, INC.,
Washington, D. C., October 31, 1949.
COMMERCIAL COUNSELOR,
British Embassy,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Because of the prestige involved, it may be possible, in spite of devaluation and payment in sterling, to supply fine American china for your and possibly other British Embassy services at an attractive price. I would, therefore, appreciate it if you would inform me as to the proper steps to be taken to have this proposal considered.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT F. MARTIN,
Executive Secretary.

BRITISH EMBASSY,
Washington, November 8, 1949.
Mr. ROBERT F. MARTIN,
Vitrified China Association, Inc.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 31st of October, and would point out that, as the United Kingdom is itself the manufacturer of some of the finest chinaware in the world, we are not in the market for china manufactured elsewhere; nor do I think that any of the other embassies in the British Commonwealth would be interested in your proposal.

Yours very truly,

F. A. DE MOLEYNS.

This country—our country—has a surplus of pork products, just as we have a surplus of china. The Government is buying up the surplus pork in order to maintain the price of hogs. Nevertheless, it will not surprise me greatly if the State Department follows through and we see the day when Polish hams embellish the German chinaware in our embassies all over the world.

DRAFTS IN THE SENATE CHAMBER

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to call the attention of the Architect of the Capitol, the engineers, and others involved, to the fact that for the last day or two a very disagreeable draft has been blowing across this rostrum, which has given everyone at the desk a cold. The Chair hopes that some steps will be taken to remedy the situation.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Father John J. Keahane, St. John the Evangelist Roman Catholic Church, Cambridge, Mass., offered the following prayer:

In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.

O Almighty and Eternal God from whom all blessings flow, we ask Thee to bless this country of ours—at present the hope of freedom-loving people throughout the world—that it may be faithful to its trust.

We ask Thee to bless the President of these United States in his unparalleled task of guiding the destinies of our beloved country in these difficult times.

Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDaniel, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 2023. An act to regulate oleomargarine, to repeal certain taxes relating to oleomargarine, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the foregoing bill, requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. GEORGE, Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. BYRD, Mr. MILLIKIN, and Mr. TAFT to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President has appointed Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. LANGER members of the Joint Select Committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government," for the disposition of executive papers referred to in the report of the Archivist of the United States numbered 50–13.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. PATMAN asked and was given permission to address the House on Tuesday next for 30 minutes, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in three instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. KLEIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in four instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper editorial.

WHEN WILL THERE BE PEACE?

Mrs. BOSONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOSONE. Mr. Speaker, since the last bullet was fired in Europe and since the last prisoner of war was released in the Pacific the imponderable hanging over all of us has been, "When will there be peace?"

Believe me, nothing is going to matter much until the minds of men are quieted on the fear of combat. We may speak of building the greatest projects on earth, of creating the greatest mass production, educating the greatest number of people, protecting the health of the millions, procuring financial security, but nothing is going to matter unless there is peace on this earth. The next war, if it comes, will prove not who is right, but who is left.

Underlying all that we do in Congress is the thought of "When will we have peace?"

The United Nations, I believe, has done a magnificent job, and its work has not been in vain. Hundreds of groups have been stimulated to further their work in organizing for world good will. But time moves on rapidly, and fear becomes so huge and powerful that its grotesqueness chokes our prospects for a joyous, prosperous, and happy world.

Any move in the direction of peace is worth trying. When I read in the Washington Evening Star on January 9 the article by Mr. Thomas L. Stokes—and I always read Thomas L. Stokes, for I think he is one of the finest and most humane columnists in America—I was particularly impressed with his reference to Mr. Irving Pflaum, foreign editor of the Chicago Sun-Times, who has made the suggestion that the people of the United States present to the people of Russia a statue of peace and brotherhood to be paid for by popular subscription by our people. His thought is much the same as that which inspired the people of France to give to the United States that glorious Goddess of Liberty which stands in New York Harbor.

The little people of Russia—the little people of the world, I am convinced, are not interested in war. They have suffered too much; they are tired. I feel sure that the little people of Russia would appreciate a gift from the little people of America. At least Mr. Pflaum's idea is well worth trying.

I should like to expand upon Mr. Pflaum's idea. I have long since believed that the women of the world should declare a strike on war. It is about time they did something about it. Women everywhere feel the same about war—regardless of the type of government under which they live or the language they speak. Any woman who has ever borne a child will fight in every way she can to keep war from coming to her country and perhaps taking her child from her. No woman, anywhere, wants to see her son, or her husband, or her father, or her daughter sent into battle.

I am wondering, therefore, if the women who live in America—this great country where women are free to express their opinions in their own way—should not pick up Mr. Pflaum's idea and give a statue of peace and brotherhood to the women of Russia. I feel sure that our women's organizations in America would spearhead the movement and stimulate women of this country to offer such a statue of peace to the Russian women. Surely the Government of the Soviet Union would not refuse to allow the entry and acceptance of such a gift.

I believe this gesture of good will and desire for peace would be very tangible evidence, not only to the women of Russia, but to women all over the world, of the sincerity and earnest desire of the American people to seek peace among nations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CARNAHAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. KEOGH (at the request of Mr. CLEMENTE) was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a magazine article.

PEANUTS AND THE ACREAGE ALLOTMENT PLAN

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Speaker, there has been reported from the Agricultural Committee of the House an amendment to the existing law dealing with the 1950 cotton acreage. I shall not discuss this, but the difficulty that is being experienced by those who have been allocated acreage is due to the fact that the State committee and the county committee in the majority of cases failed to carry out the law, the directives, or regulations issued by the Department of Agriculture as to the allocation of acreage, that is, to reserve 10 percent for State adjustments and 15 percent for county or farm adjustments, or vice versa. The additional acreage that is proposed in the amendment will only be that much more additional cotton for the Government to purchase. The subject I desire to bring before the House is the amendment dealing with peanuts. It is a fact that the Commodity Credit Corporation purchased in 1948, 85 percent of runner-type peanuts grown, and yet, in this additional amendment it provides for the growing of additional runner-type peanuts which will mean that the Commodity Credit Corporation will have to purchase more of this type peanut. In addition to this, I am informed that in the Spanish-type area farmers are diverting from Spanish to runner-type which will further confuse this situation, whereas in the Virginia-type area there is today not a sufficient amount of this type peanut produced to meet the great market demand, and the cost to the Commodity Credit Corporation in handling this type peanut program has been negligible. Therefore, instead of reporting out this amendment, the entire peanut program should be revised so as to divide the peanut-producing areas into types similar to the tobacco program; that is, there should be the Virginia-type area, the runner-type area, and the Spanish-type area. In the light of the facts above, it is my present intention to oppose the resolution presented to the House from the Committee on Agriculture for further increasing the production of cotton and peanuts in the face of a great surplus in the market today in both crops. I am interested in saving the entire farm program—not destroying it through patchwork.

UNITED STATES CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, I introduced a bill (H. R. 6848) to authorize the judges of the Federal courts to use their discretion in imposing either a fine or imprisonment, or both, for certain offenses.

For 10 years or more, at nearly every conference of United States attorneys, composed of men who represent the great law-enforcement branch of the Federal Government, a resolution was adopted urging the repeal of the mandatory provisions of the internal revenue statutes pertaining to the manufacturing of illicit liquor and empowering the judges of the Federal courts to use their discretion in imposing fines or imprisonment in such cases. The amendments proposed in nowise change the maximum penalties heretofore provided in such cases.

The exercise of such discretion by the courts is a recognized judicial function and existing statutes which assume to curtail it by requiring the court to impose both a fine and imprisonment should be amended.

During my years of service as United States attorney for the eastern district of Tennessee, I prosecuted many cases for illicit distilling and similar offenses. In each case, where the defendant was found guilty, the court was obliged by the terms of the law to impose both a fine and imprisonment. Almost without exception, the defendant was financially unable to pay the fine imposed with the result that millions of dollars of fines were uncollected and uncollectible. If the court in those cases had been authorized to exercise its proper discretion it would not have imposed such fines.

In 1946 when Congress enacted the revision of the Criminal Code, it abolished the requirement for mandatory fines and imprisonment in scores of cases and substituted the generally accepted language permitting the court to impose either a fine or imprisonment, or both. The few provisions relating to liquor offenses which still require both fine and imprisonment were not incorporated in the Criminal Code and consequently were not amended by the act revising that code.

The Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives in its report on the revision—House Report 304, Eightieth Congress—in commenting upon the change in punishment provisions, stated that "legislative attempts to control the discretion of the sentencing judge are contrary to the opinions of experienced criminologists and criminal-law experts. They are calculated to work manifest injustice in many cases."

In the light of that statement, my bill also eliminated minimum punishments in these cases. The court could, by exercising the power it has to suspend sentence, avoid the imposition of any fine or imprisonment at all, and should have the authority to impose fines or imprisonments to a limited extent. As a matter of fact, the elimination of the minimum will enable the court to impose a just penalty where otherwise it would have suspended the imposition of any penalty.

Mr. Speaker, I urge prompt action upon my bill, H. R. 6848, so that the intention of the Congress in this matter will be extended to those few instances where the courts are still hampered by being required to impose both a fine and imprisonment.

GEN. ROBERT E. LEE

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, this being the birthday of Gen. Robert E. Lee and in view of the increasingly high esteem for this outstanding Christian military and educational leader, it is fitting that we should call attention to the occasion.

It was my privilege last night to speak before the Sidney Lanier Chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy at Confederate Memorial Hall here in the city of Washington, on the lives and characters of Gen. Robert E. Lee, Gen. Thomas J. Jackson, and Commodore Matthew Fontaine Maury, all of whose birthdays fall within the week.

I ask leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include therein a copy of my address.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, is is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE BUDGET OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I arise to make a suggestion concerning the budget of the United States. I believe if this suggestion were carried out, it would please a great many people back home.

Our present tax structure will bring in a little more than $37,000,000,000 this year, it is estimated.

Why not, then, give Harry Truman twice the spending money that was given Franklin Roosevelt in any peacetime year? This would require $22,000,000,000.

The remaining fifteen billions could be divided—seven and one-half billions applied on the national debt and seven and one-half billions to reduce taxes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WOODRUFF asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances; in one to include an article, and in the other a newspaper article.

Mr. JAMES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a newspaper item.

Mr. LEFEVRE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. LICHTENWALTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. BOGGS of Delaware asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous material.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD in two instances and to include newspaper articles.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

Mr. MASON asked and was given permission to address the House on Monday next, after the disposition of the regular business of the day and any special orders heretofore entered, for 5 minutes, on the subject John L. Lewis versus Samuel Gompers.

Mr. ANGELL asked and was given permission to address the house today for 15 minutes at the conclusion of the legislative business and any other special orders heretofore entered.

STATE SEALS

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, we have had a great deal of discussion about the beautiful old traditional glass seals that many of us understood were to be put where these almost invisible and rather indistinguishable seals have been placed by the Architect of the Capitol.

It happens that in London there is being built a chapel, a memorial to the American men who died in England for the freedom of the world. This chapel is to be reached from St. Paul's Cathedral through beautiful wrought-iron gates overshadowed by several stained-glass windows. The reports that come to me advised that the suggestion has been made to make these windows out of the seals of the States.

The British are a people who have a deep regard for tradition; they know its value. It has occurred to me that we might well find out whether the beautiful old seals under which the laws of this great country have been drafted for some 90 years, which have been rejected by those responsible for the changes in this Chamber, might be acceptable to those who are building this memorial chapel. Should this be the case—and no other suggestion for a suitable use of these traditional bits of American glass be forthcoming—I feel sure that we can feel certain of the respect and care that will be given these rejected seals on into the dim future.

REPEAL OF EXCISE TAXES

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, cameras and films are not luxury items in my home city of Binghamton, N. Y., the home of 8,000 Ansco workers who make film and cameras. The Ansco plant is one of the largest of its kind in the world. From time to time they have called upon me to urge the Congress to remove excise taxes once and for all. I am carrying out their demand here today and express the hope that this House will be given the opportunity to vote down excise taxes so that the workers in the Ansco plant in Binghamton will have the chance to make a livelihood and continue with their jobs. Their jobs are being threatened because production is down.

Personally, I do not look upon cameras and photographic equipment as luxuries. They are simply a part of the advanced American standard of living. They should be within the reach of the pocketbook of every American. The 25-percent addition to these prices, which is the excise tax, is exorbitant and unnecessary. The public has the right to enjoy these films and cameras at a reasonable cost, and I think the tremendous excise tax upon them is outrageous and should be taken off.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

THE POWER OF THE RULES COMMITTEE

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include a letter from one of my colleagues.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a letter from a colleague reads as follows:

JANUARY 17, 1950.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: There is pending before the House at this time an issue of transcendent importance to the American people: Shall a majority of the House of Representatives retain control of the legislative processes or shall this control be returned to a small group of willful men in the Committee on Rules?

The move by the Committee on Rules to seize anew its former arbitrary power to block legislation favorably reported by other standing committees of the House is a grave threat to representative government.

The issue is far more important than any measure against which the rules change is purportedly directed. Regardless of party, can any Member who really believes in democracy deny to a majority of the House the right even to decide whether a given bill shall be taken up for debate?

To abolish the 21-day discharge rule can only result in deterioration of legislative processes that, as a matter of fact, need strengthening. This is not a partisan issue. The rules of the House affect all parties. When the 21-day rule was adopted, earnest cooperation by Members of both parties resulted in the final action that was hailed throughout the press of this land as a major achievement in good government.

A vote on this important issue is probable before the week end. I appeal to you to come forth and confirm the faith of the people in the Congress.

Sincerely,

HERMAN P. EBERHARTER,
Chairman, Informal Rules Reform Committee.

I wish to call attention to one paragraph. Let me read:

Regardless of party, can any Member who really believes in democracy deny to a majority of the House the right even to decide whether a given bill shall be taken up for debate?

It is my hope that if and when the distinguished gentleman ascends the bench, becomes a Federal judge, that he go a little deeper in his research to ascertain the facts and then be a little more accurate in the conclusions which he expresses from the bench than he is in this letter. Anyone who ever paid any attention to the House rules and procedure knows that the House has never been gagged as to legislation which it wished to consider.

Whenever 218, a majority of the Members, want to vote on a bill, they have the power to bring it to the floor.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RODINO asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two separate instances and in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. PATTEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

THE POWER OF THE RULES COMMITTEE

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLIFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reply to the statement just made by my friend the gentleman from Michigan.

On January 3, 1949, this Congress, by an overwhelming vote of 275 to 143, voted for a rule which would permit legislation to come from any committee whose chairman desired to stand on the floor after a certain period of time and ask that the legislation be considered by 435 Members of the House. In the last analysis, each Member of Congress owes his responsibility to the people in his district and the Nation to show where he stands on controversial legislation. So far as I am concerned, I am not willing to go back to the Dark Ages when six men on the Rules Committee could decide arbitrarily on the merits of legislation. I believe that it is an individual responsibility for every Member of Congress to decide whether a piece of legislation has merit or does not have merit, and I, as one Member, do not need six men to sit as a superjury and exercise judicial opinion as to whether I shall be allowed to vote upon any piece of legislation. I say that any man who does not have the guts to decide for himself on controversial measures needs a wet nurse in place of six men on the Rules Committee to help him out.

I understand that a motion to adjourn will be made just before consideration of the Cox resolution, House Resolution 133, which is to be considered Friday. In my opinion, any attempt to postpone consideration of this measure is dilatory and without justification.

The Member who votes to adjourn on Friday puts himself on record as being unwilling to vote on probably the most important matter which will face the Eighty-first Congress.

Unless the Cox resolution is defeated, every piece of legislation passed by the House, which is now pending in the Senate or in conference, is jeopardized by the possibility of possible adverse action of the Rules Committee through blocking the report of conference reports to the House. Please note that I said "possible adverse action."

Future legislation such as the National Science Foundation bill, legislation for middle-income housing, hospital and medical scholarship aid, as well as other progressive legislation, may be denied legislative consideration.

The failure to defeat the Cox resolution will be regarded as a key vote to kill every progressive measure to which the Democratic Party is pledged.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BIEMILLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include a speech he made before the Junior Bar Association of Milwaukee, Wis.

PROPOSED CHANGE IN RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include certain telegrams.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, there are strange rumors afloat that our Republican colleagues have succumbed to the wiles of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], and, following his leadership, are going to attempt to adjourn the House when it convenes tomorrow.

I think these gentlemen might be interested to know that I have just received a telegram from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People urging that the House meet tomorrow, stay in session and vote down the proposed change in the rules tomorrow and not do any monkeying around with further parliamentary procedure.

The telegram reads:

Hon. ANDREW J. BIEMILLER,
House Office Building:

We urge that the House remain in session on Friday, January 20 and vote down the Rules Committee's proposal to change the 21-day rule.

ROY WILKINS,
Acting Secretary, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

The duration of this strange affair between the Republicans and Mr. MARCANTONIO is unpredictable, but its existence cannot be doubted.

How else account for his strange insistence that we adjourn Friday without whipping the attempt to rescind the 21-day rule? The Republicans are in favor of this device, but are squirming on the hook as the result of a wire each of the minority Members received from the NAACP this morning which read in part—and I quote:

The entire civil-rights program is endangered by the proposal of the Rules Committee to abandon the present 21-day rule. We urge you to be present at all sessions to vote against this dangerous backward step.

Remember the same group has specifically stated it wants the vote on this motion to come tomorrow on the single and clearcut issue of the rule.

If the gentleman from New York thinks he can get the whole Republican Party off the hook, he will find himself sadly mistaken.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, this week will go down in the history of the Congress as the week of rank hypocrisy. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BIEMILLER] who has been protesting so vociferously his love for FEPC wanted the FEPC bill enacted, his first obligation would be to see to it that the resolution which makes it impossible to bring up FEPC on Monday would not come up tomorrow, so that on Monday next we could vote on FEPC.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BIEMILLER] has been here long enough to know that if the resolution comes up tomorrow and if it is adopted we will not have a chance to vote on FEPC on Monday next. Why take the risk? He loves FEPC when he does not have a chance to vote on it; when he has a chance to vote on it that love fades far, far away.

He may as well face it. Despite his glib talk, the people will know that his vote against adjournment tomorrow will be a vote against FEPC.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] is proceeding on an altogether wrong premise. This resolution to amend the rules of the House, in my opinion, will not prevail. I have always been a supporter of FEPC. I am also, and have been, a supporter of President Truman's program. I want Mr. Truman's program, including the FEPC, to win. That is the reason I want this resolution to amend the rules defeated on Friday. I want it out of the way. The gentleman is also proceeding in his interpretation of the rules on a wrong premise. I can tell him I have that on competent authority.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. It is interesting to note the relationship on adjournment Friday between the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] and the Republican leadership.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I understand the suggestion was first made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] to offer a motion to adjourn tomorrow, and I understand also the minority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] has accepted that suggestion from him. So they are working together.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EBERHARTER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. If the gentleman really wants FEPC, why take a chance on bringing up this resolution tomorrow, which may kill FEPC? He cannot get away from that. He can cover it with all the baloney about the Republicans he wants to, but he cannot escape the fact that bringing up this resolution tomorrow endangers FEPC.

Mr. EBERHARTER. If the gentleman wants to sacrifice votes so that the Truman Fair Deal program will be defeated, that is up to him.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is what the Democratic leadership is doing when it calls up the resolution tomorrow. It is just double talking.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an address he will deliver today to the Daughters of the Confederacy in Constitution Hall.

KOREAN AID ACT OF 1949

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 368 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5330) to promote world peace and the general welfare, national interest, and foreign policy of the United States by providing aid to the Republic of Korea. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order the Korean aid bill, known as H. R. 5330, reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It has the approval of the President and the Secretary of State.

The Committee on Rules has heard the considered evidence of gentlemen who have spent 2 and 3 years in that new Republic. They are of the opinion, and firmly believe, that this legislation is absolutely necessary to aid Korea, and that without this aid it would be impossible to bring about the conditions and improvements they are seeking in the interests of the people of that country. Of course, it calls for an authorization of $150,000,000, but, Mr. Speaker, we already have expended in aid to Korea about $360,000,000. Unless this bill is passed, I fear that the $360,000,000 that has been heretofore expended will be lost. Of course, there are some who believe that the appropriation of $150,000,000 provided for in this bill may also be lost because of the danger that Russia may step in and take over. But, I have it on very good authority from people who know, who are informed, and who have made a thorough investigation, that there is no such danger. So, therefore, the argument that this might be lost, is not well founded and not supported by real facts.

Personally, I am for economy and I am willing to reduce appropriations everywhere possible or feasible. Our friends on the other side advocate economy, but unfortunately every time they have a chance to vote for increased appropriations, they do so. Therefore in this instance the charge that the authorization of $150,000,000 should not prevail or should not be granted, on the theory that we should reduce the deficit, is not well founded. We have appropriated billions and billions of dollars for countries nowhere near as deserving as Korea, and I do not know of any better investment we have ever made than by granting this rule. Therefore, after hearing the evidence of those who know, the Committee on Rules reported this rule, and I am going to ask for its adoption making in order the bill providing that much-needed relief.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs has filed a very comprehensive report on this measure, tracing the genesis of the present situation from its early beginnings, through the period of liberation of the Korean people from Japanese control and domination, and the development of the impasse with Soviet Russia regarding the political future of Korea. It has developed, in this report, the various stages by which the United States now finds itself with an obligation to the Korean people and the Republic of Korea—the direct obligation upon which this bill is passed.

In the very short period of time since the Republic of Korea was established, democratic elections have been held and a government of, by, and for the people has been established.

Bolstered by the love of freedom and independence that has kept it a liberty-seeking nation under 40 years of Japanese rule—retaining this same spirit of determination for self-rule during 3 years of division and occupation following the end of hostilities in the Far East, the people of Korea have not faltered during the difficult first year or more of the republic. They have met the challenge of establishing a new government of their own. They have woven together the traditions of their 4,000 years of history with modern democratic theory into a solid pattern of successful government. This has all been accomplished in the face of a threat as great as that faced by any nation on the face of the globe—the Communist threat and operation in the northern section of that land.

Through American military cooperation in the defense program and the economic support granted through ECA, Korea has been enabled to establish itself as a free nation and to make the fullest possible contribution in the global struggle to safeguard democratic freedom against the aggressive drive of totalitarian communism. Korea has constantly reiterated its intention to stand shoulder to shoulder with the friends of freedom against every totalitarian threat.

The present bill presents the first full effort by Congress to place in the form of legislation a definite policy toward Korea. All other assistance to Korea has been in the form of appropriations requested by the President. The policy established by this legislation carries out the principles of the Charter of the United Nations as part of United States foreign policy.

There is also an indirect relation to the security of the United States in this Korean program. If Korea falls, the Communists are just that much closer to Japan. For us to withdraw from Korea today, as far as this assistance is concerned, without giving these people who have placed their entire trust in us for survival, is just not an honorable American action to expect. We owe it as much to the indomitable Korean people, as we do to our friends across the Atlantic, to give them all the financial, moral, and military support we can, if not more so.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the minority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago a Member of the House made the statement that one of the colored organizations is opposed to the adjournment of the House tomorrow before taking up the resolution to amend the rules. Since that time I have had a message conveyed to me to the effect that the National Negro Council supports adjournment and urges its friends to vote for adjournment tomorrow.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may desire.

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the rule on this bill, but I have very serious doubts with regard to the bill itself. It is a bill that brings up some extremely important considerations dealing with the foreign policy of the United States.

Testimony will be given here at a later date to the effect that Korea is militarily untenable, that under none of our defense plans as such could we consider trying to hold Korea in the event of aggressive action north of the thirty-eighth parallel by either Communist-trained Korean troops or by Russian troops.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, Korea is an independent republic. It became an independent republic as a result of our military action and as a result of the United Nations recognition of it as a newly created independent republic, an independence which it had not had for a long period of time since it had been under Japanese domination.

That republic is today struggling in the southern half of what constituted the old territory of Korea to maintain itself from an economic point of view in the face of a very serious and difficult economic situation. We have spent nearly half a billion dollars in military occupation costs in that country. We have already spent some $60,000,000 since the independent republic was established in trying to give it economic aid so that it can stand on its own feet.

The main objection that I have to the bill that will be before us is to its statement of purpose at the outset, which commits us to what in effect is a long-range aid-to-Korea program. In the uncertain Far East today, I think it would be a great mistake for us to make a commitment of that kind. On the other hand, we are faced by this situation.

If we withdraw aid from Korea, no witness can possibly testify that there will not be economic chaos in a comparatively short time and that then the standard technique which Russian communism has used everywhere is sure to step in, namely to develop in that chaos a strong Communist cell which would begin a revolution which would get its support from the Communist Koreans north of the 38th parallel and eventually from the Soviet Government.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTER. I am glad to yield.

Mr. RANKIN. As a matter of fact, is it not true that the United States now owes more money than all the rest of the countries of the world put together? Is that your understanding?

Mr. HERTER. I would assume so.

Mr. RANKIN. You talk about chaos in Korea. If we keep pouring the money of the American taxpayers down the rat-holes of Europe, Asia, Israel, Africa, and Japan, how long will it be before we will be in economic chaos?

Mr. HERTER. I do not agree with the gentleman's statement with regard to rate-holes. I think we have a security interest of the first order in trying to maintain the free peoples of this world. We are not strong enough militarily or financially or in any other way to live in a world which is completely dominated by the Communists on every side of us.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTER. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Korea is a small country among the vast population of China, is it not?

Mr. HERTER. It is. The area that we are talking about, I think, embraces about 21,000,000 people.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. If Korea were armed according to our standards, as we are today, could it maintain its independence against an onslaught from the rest of China and Russia?

Mr. HERTER. I would think probably not.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTER. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. Did I understand the gentleman to say that since the establishment of the Republic of Korea we have spent $60,000,000 there?

Mr. HERTER. We have done that through appropriations in one form or another, but without any formal authorization. The Congress, as I understand it, has never made any commitment of any kind by legislation for continuing Korean aid.

Mr. KEATING. Unless I am in error, the total expenditures set forth on page 26 of the report, which have been made in Korea to date, are $385,000,000.

Mr. HERTER. Those figures include the military occupation costs before the Independent Republic of Korea was set up, while we were the occupation authority.

Mr. KEATING. I see. The $60,000,000 you speak of is only a portion of that $385,000,000?

Mr. HERTER. The $60,000,000 is what has been spent since the independence of the Republic was proclaimed and recognized by the world.

Mr. KEATING. Is that in addition to the $385,000,000 to which I have referred?

Mr. HERTER. That is in addition.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Is it not a fact that the United States Government now owes more than the total assessed valuation of all the property west of the Mississippi River?

Mr. HERTER. I am not sure of the figure. The gentleman is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. It is very close to it, if not exactly that. Is it not a fact that during the past 2 years the Federal Government collected more in taxes than at any time in the history of the Government, and we still went into the red?

Mr. HERTER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Is it not a fact that if we give these $130,000,000 to Korea we will have to borrow the money, or else raise the national debt?

Mr. HERTER. It will certainly increase the deficit. There is no question about that. I think that is a very important consideration. I had hoped that this Korean matter could be cared for on a different basis from that which is provided for in this bill. Actually, you will hear testimony to the effect that this bill makes an authorization, or will, after an amendment offered by the committee, for only $60,000,000 additional. However, the statement of intent, at the beginning of the bill, will make for a moral commitment which would certainly carry over a very much longer period of time.

However, Mr. Speaker, as this is a matter of real major policy in connection with our over-all world policy, I feel the rule should be adopted and that both sides ought to have a full opportunity to be heard.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERTER. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we are trying to get funds to build some veterans' hospitals which are very necessary. We are told that the opposition is opposing it on the ground of economy. Yet here they come along and propose to give out of the taxpayers' money, out of the pockets of many of these disabled veterans themselves, not only $150,000,000 provided in this bill, but probably it will run to half a billion before it is through. I cannot see the consistency.

Mr. HERTER. I think the gentleman is correct in his statement. On the other hand, I think we have a major problem that comes ahead of any other problem, and that is the problem of our own security.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. HERTER. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Has it come to the gentleman's attention that many, many Members on both sides of the aisle went back to their districts this last summer and got up and told how they were for economy; that we were spending too much, and that we could not continue to do what we were doing. Is that not true?

Mr. HERTER. I am very sure of that.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Today some of those people who have been talking economy will have a chance to vote, and we will see whether they will back up the promises they made to the people back home.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SABATH. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to use any additional time?

Mr. HERTER. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS].

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, I oppose this bill and I oppose this rule. Considered in the light of our policy in the Far East, this program, which is not a one-hundred-and-twenty-million-dollar program but a permanent policy which involves a present program of $385,000,000, is, to use General Marshall's words, a "piecemeal palliative" that I think we just cannot afford.

We are not going to get enough light on our far-eastern policy, with reference to China and the rest of Asia, from the published hearings or in 1 hour of general debate to make an intelligent decision. Remember, this is not a 1-year proposition. True, the authorization is for 1 year, but if you will look at the bill, section 2 provides:

> It is hereby declared to be the policy of the people of the United States to continue to assist the people of Korea—

And there is no termination date put on it.

Since this is such a long-range policy, your committee last June decided to obtain testimony on our whole far-eastern situation from Secretary Acheson, Under Secretary Webb, George Kennon, and Assistant Secretary Butterworth for the Far East. You will find hardly any of that testimony, however, in the hearings. I tried to find out from the Department of State the reason for this suppression of testimony, and I received a letter from the Secretary of State last night, in which he said:

> We followed the principle of including in the testimony cleared for release, only information which pertained to the subject of aid to Korea, the issue involved in this legislation.

However, on page 115 of the hearings, you will find a statement by Mr. Webb, Under Secretary of State, of the Administration's story on the whole situation in China. If you will look, however, on pages 149 and 150 you will find no indication that Mr. Butterworth, when it came to his testimony, deleted not only what he said but what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD] and I said, and you will find no indication that there has been a deletion or suppression.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. VORYS. I yield.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

KOREAN AID ACT OF 1949

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, I did not ask for a quorum. But there were those who thought some of you who were absent might like to hear something about this Korean aid bill. I am opposed to the bill and opposed to the rule. The rule provides 1 hour of debate. I think in the light of our total far eastern policy—or lack of policy—this permanent policy of assisting Korea with a program, not of $120,000,000, that is only the first installment, but of $385,000,000, and leaving Korea in the red $35,000,000 after 3 years, is—to use General Marshall's words—a "piecemeal palliative." To use a more common expression, this is strictly rat-hole money which we cannot afford.

You cannot consider this intelligently without considering our whole far-eastern policy, but you will not get our far-eastern policy out of the hearings printed in this bill.

When this bill came up in committee on June 8, last summer, with orders that it must be through the Congress by June 30, the committee wanted to know about our whole far-eastern policy, of which Korea and its policy is a small part, and called for administration witnesses and held hearings for 9 days. But you will not find all that in this book. The State Department has suppressed almost all of the hearings that would give the background of this matter. However, not quite all.

I have been attempting for 6 months to find out what military or diplomatic secrecy justified the suppression, not only of the testimony of departmental witnesses, but statements of mine and Mr. JUDD's before the committee. I received a letter from Secretary Acheson on that, last evening, and this is what he said:

> I have given careful consideration to your request that certain testimony given in executive session in June 1949 be released for publication and I regret that I cannot agree with your proposal.
>
> It will be recalled that at the inception of the hearing in question, it was agreed that no departmental testimony would be made public without the consent of the Department. In making our recommendations to the committee last year as to which testimony should be made public, we followed the principle of including in the testimony cleared for release only the information which pertained to the subject of aid to Korea, the issue involved in this legislation—except for a small portion thereof which, for security reasons, we felt should not be made public.
> Officials of the Department discussed very frankly with members of the committee in executive session many other matters. To publish a discussion of this nature, extraneous to the main issue involved, or to publish excerpts from it out of context, would, in my opinion, not be consistent with the kind of continuing confidential relationship which, of necessity, must exist between officials of the Department and members of the committee on matters handled in executive session.

However, you will find a statement read by Under Secretary of State Webb on the whole Chinese situation on page 115 of the hearings. That was apparently not considered extraneous. That was information which pertains to the subject of aid to Korea. But you will not find any cross-examination of Mr. Webb, Mr. Kennan, or Mr. Butterworth on the background of the Chinese policy. Anything the committee asked was apparently "extraneous."

These hearings were such as are conducted on appropriations and by other committees. They were in executive session, in this case to prevent any inadvertent leak of military or diplomatic secrets. But there was to be prepared a record to come to the floor so that the rest of the Congress would know something about what went on. The Department officials were permitted to edit the statements of their own witnesses and to take out anything of military or diplomatic secrecy. I will not disclose what any administration witness said in the hearing. I do feel justified, however, in telling you not what some witness said, not what I asked but what I said there, so as to ask you whether or not you can conceive that what I referred to was a diplomatic or military secret. I said:

> Mr. VORYS. The gentleman is so highly erroneous and distorts the history of the legislation so shockingly that I feel I should correct him.
> I want to read from the conference report. The Senate does not have a conference report, but by tradition and usage, uses the House conference report to explain the thing on the floor of the Senate:

"Of the total authorization it was agreed that $125,000,000 should be provided under the language of the Senate bill, allowing for aid of military character, with $338,000,000 remaining for the economic reconstruction type of aid. In making this adjustment the allotment for military aid is slightly larger in proportion to purely economic aid than in the original House bill. These changes are embodied in section 404 of the agreed bill."

It was at the insistence of the Department of State, their entreaties and insistence during that conference, that the words "military aid" were not inserted into the bill, and the same thing happened on the Senate bill. But the House report shows quite clearly that the net result of the conference was to raise the military aid as it said here:

"The allotment for military aid is slightly larger in proportion than in the original House bill."

So any deletion of the word "military," and insistence that it should be put in solely as an appropriation to the President, was solely at the insistence of the State Department, in opposition to the views of both Houses and the conferees of both Houses, and therefore to take that as a statement of the intention of Congress, in view of the contemporary statements outside the statute, that this was to be military aid, is shockingly inaccurate history.

Here is what Mr. JUDD said that was deleted from the published hearings:

Mr. JUDD. It is worse than subterfuge to come down and ask Congress to agree to language that would be less provocative and then take our agreement as indicating we did not want you to carry out the purpose that was in the original language.

Mr. JUDD later furnished for insertion in the Korean aid hearings the following from the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate, June 10, 1948, page 527:

Mr. THORP. May I make sure that my answer to the question of our attitude on this legislation is clear, that we in the State Department question the desirability of the proviso which was placed by the House Appropriations Committee in connection with this expenditure which would tie it into the objectives and limitations in the act for assistance to Greece and Turkey. At that point we feel that there should be a change in the legislation.

* * * * *

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. May I make one statement, sir? The Secretary of State, who I believe is appearing before the committee shortly, did authorize me to state that he is opposed to the provision regarding the inclusion of China in Greek-Turkish legislation.

This quotation from a public hearing, furnished for the record by a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Mr. JUDD, was deleted from the purported hearings on Korean aid by the State Department.

The statement of Mr. W. W. Butterworth on June 20, contained on pages 149 and 150 of the printed hearings does not indicate that there was any omission or deletion of any kind in his own testimony, nor does it show the suppression of these statements by two committee members.

As I say, the full story of our Far Eastern policy is suppressed in the hearings, and this story cannot be presented adequately under a rule that permits only 1 hour of debate.

However, using such light as we have, viewed in the perspective of our Far Eastern policy, let us look at this Korean-aid proposition. I want to take my text from General Marshall in his famous Harvard speech of June 5, 1947. We had gone through a lot of piecemeal, stop-gap foreign-aid legislation, and Congress and the country were getting tired of it; so at Harvard General Marshall said, as to future aid policy:

Such assistance, I am convinced, must not be on a piecemeal basis as various crises develop; any assistance that this Government may render in the future should provide a cure rather than a mere palliative.

I believed that, and that is the policy I have been attempting to follow ever since. It is the policy that is not followed here. In this legislation there is no direct benefit to our military security; our troops are out; the Soviets can come into southern Korea whenever they wish. I call your attention to page 170 of the hearings.

This is no economic cure, but a palliative. The program was ably and honestly presented by ECA. Mr. Hoffman himself testified, and you will find his testimony at page 15 of the hearings and in the report at pages 27 and 28, that 25 percent of this money is to go for freight. The first part of the program is to last 3 years and to cost not $120,000,000, but $385,000,000. At the end of that period Korea will be out of balance $35,000,000. So it cannot be justified as an economic cure for the ills of Korea.

There is no commitment, no agreement, no obligation. If you will turn to page 182 of the hearings you will find that Mr. Claxton from the Department of State, said:

This is not a commitment in the sense of an international treaty, an international agreement; it is not as much as a promise.

Why, therefore, do we go forward with this program which does not involve our military security, which does not help solve our own economic problems and will not solve Korea's economic problems, with half of Korea under Communist control, and for which we have no obligation, no commitment? Why? Because we helped Korea secure independence. How about Indonesia? We helped Indonesia secure independence in the United Nations and outside. How about Israel? We helped Israel secure independence in the United Nations and outside. How about India, Finland, Burma, Austria, and other countries whose independence and membership in the family of nations we aided and welcomed? Are we to continue to assist them, or is Korea to be a special case?

The Koreans are fine people, a gallant people who are making a magnificent struggle. We have helped them to the tune of $445,000,000 already. They may, however, have to do as we did after we achieved our independence—get along without outside help.

On June 23, Secretary Acheson stated before our committee in summing up his argument for Korean aid—hearings, page 192:

There is no assurance that the thing is going to be successful; there is complete assurance that Korea will go in 2 or 3 months if you do not do this.

Last June the Secretary said:

There is complete assurance that Korea will go in 2 or 3 months if you do not do this.

Six months later, Korea is still holding her head up as an independent nation and we have not done this; we have not passed this bill. When it comes to the Far East, our Secretary of State shows as much ability in predicting the future as he does in explaining the past.

We cannot justify this as conscience money. There are those who would vote for it because their consciences hurt them for what they have done, or not done, about China and Formosa. My conscience does not hurt me as to what I have advocated for Asia, China, Formosa.

There are those who want to vote for this on an "iffy" basis; on the basis that if we had done what we should have in China, Manchuria, Formosa, at Yalta, and so forth, Korea would now be a sound economic and military part of our policy. I cannot justify a vote based on something that did not happen, merely because I wish it had happened. We must face the situation as it is, regardless of how it got that way.

There are those who will vote for this as a vote of confidence in the policy or lack of policy of their administration and the Secretary of State. I have no such confidence.

There are those who are voting for this on a sympathy basis. Congress voted money for Finland back in 1940 out of sympathy. I voted against it. I felt then about them as I do about this. I feel a great sympathy for the Republic of Korea and will show it in my own voluntary way; but I do not think Congressmen have any right to be sympathetic or charitable with other people's money.

I have given a good bit of thought, as we get closer to the deadline in our own financial status, as we go deeper into the red, to this whole matter. This is a goodwill, humanitarian, charity measure. Of all human virtues, the greatest is charity, but it is an individual virtue, and it must be voluntary. You cannot be charitable with somebody else's money. I have come to the conclusion that Congress has no right to appropriate money, to take it from American taxpayers by involuntary means, to give to foreign countries for solely charitable purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HERTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman the balance of the time on this side.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, not only has Congress no right under our Constitution to give away taxpayers' money solely for charitable purposes, but foreign countries do not believe us when we say we are giving them something just because we love them. They look for the "gimmick."

Mr. Speaker, I hope our people continue to be big-hearted, charitable, and humanitarian. I hope that our great voluntary agencies, our churches, continue the fine work they have carried on so magnificently during the 160 years of our existence. But whatever our Government does should serve our own purpose and policies and we should say so.

Under present circumstances and in view of our present policies in Asia, we are not justified in adding to our deficit any further by voting money for this permanent policy of economic aid to Korea. It may be that in the future as we develop a new policy, as we develop legislation which is now before our committee, Korea will receive aid under some mutual aid plan, some far eastern plan that makes sense and conforms to some sensible policy. I hope that day will come. But in the present state of our policy or lack of policy, we should not vote money down the Korean rat hole that will not save them militarily, that will not add to our military security, that will not help us economically, but will be, on the contrary, an economic drain, that will not solve their economic problem, a program for which we have made no promise, no commitment, no obligation.

Mr. Speaker, this rule should be voted down. If it is not voted down, I shall offer a motion to recommit this bill for further study and hearings so that it may be brought in here later in order that we may know what we are doing.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. I do not know what rules the gentleman has in his committee in the taking of testimony in hearings, but I have never yet heard in our committee that departments are given permission to edit or delete any of the questions propounded by a Member of Congress on the committee. However, in case of security we have an understanding that the testimony is always available to all of the committee, and there is no deletion.

Mr. VORYS. Up to this Korean aid bill that was, so far as I remember, the practice in our committee. In this instance not my questions, but my statement as well as that of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD], to the committee—not on any military or diplomatic question but on what the China Aid Act of 1948 meant—was deleted, and I have been unable to get it back in, and I have been trying for 6 months.

Mr. STEFAN. Under the rule of our committee when that happens in a department, the original transcript is returned to the committee with the original statement and the questions, and no deletion is allowed. But, it is not made public. However, if it is of a secret nature it is left in the committee for the information of the members of the committee, of course. But, that statement had something to do with security, did it?

Mr. VORYS. No. It had nothing to do with security. My statement and the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD], had to do with the construction of the China Aid Act of 1948.

Mr. STEFAN. That ought to be corrected in the gentleman's committee by a rule set up in that committee.

Mr. VORYS. It certainly should.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman quoted the Secretary of State. If the gentleman will read further in the statement of the Secretary of State he said that if nothing is done, Korea will be lost within 2 or 3 months. What would the gentleman say to that?

Mr. VORYS. On June 23 the Secretary of State said—and it is in the hearings—"There is no assurance that the thing is going to be successful. There is complete assurance that Korea will go in 2 or 3 months if you do not do this." That was 6 months ago. I submit that his ability as a prophet is equal to his ability as an apologist for our policy in the Far East.

The SPEAKER. The time for the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I followed closely the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS], and with a great deal of interest. I appreciate the fact that he has spent considerable time in China and that he has an active interest in Chinese affairs.

Of course, we have two or three other gentlemen, who, like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS], seem to be, for reasons unknown to me, continually assailing the administration policy and urging the support of the corrupt and vicious Chiang Kai-shek government. This latter government has been misruled for many years by a most tainted clique, whom the United States has aided, in the last few years, with three to four billion dollars and with millions upon millions of dollars worth of supplies and war materials. Yes, with air power, naval power, vehicles, and ammunition, notwithstanding the reports of such men as Gen. George Marshall and General Wedemeyer, who reported to the people of the United States that Chiang and his dishonest group refused to bring about any agreement for peace between the Chinese Nationalists and the revolutionary forces. Not only these two great generals, but many others have made clear the fact that our aid to China could not and has not saved the crooked Chiang government from defeat. Witness the Chinese white paper that was published last year by our State Department.

In the last three or four months we have come to generally recognize and realize that the days of the Chiang regime are gone forever and are far beyond any hope of being retained. Witness the moving of Chiang Kai-shek and his capital city from one place to another until now, they have abandoned the Chinese mainland and have retreated to Formosa.

Now comes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] and objects to the authorization of this small amount to Korea and to aid the new Korean Republic. Korea is pleading and urging us to aid them so as to enable them to maintain themselves and retain their hard-won freedom and independence which they gained about a year ago. The gentleman from Ohio concedes that the Koreans are a splendid people, and I concur. Although I am interested in economy, I feel that by our aiding the Koreans and helping them maintain their freedom, it is well worth the amount called for in this bill as opposed to the spending of billions of dollars to aid the old Chinese clique in Formosa and their lust for returned power, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] and others urged. It is comparable to sinking money into a rat hole, for certainly that is what has happened to the billions of dollars that we have spent and that the gentleman from Ohio would like us to spend on China and Formosa.

Of course, there are several other gentlemen on his Republican side who preach economy and yet advocate the spending of billions of dollars on the lost cause of China. All this because they were in China for a short time and sympathize with China, but not with the poor, unfortunate, oppressed common people of China who have been fighting valiantly for many years to overthrow the corrupt Chiang government so that they can obtain better social and economic conditions for themselves and their families.

However, other well-informed men, in addition to our State Department, which seems to be possessed of all the facts, know what is for the best interests of the United States—certainly more so than the gentlemen who are appealing for aid to the Chinese and Formosa.

I personally believe that the appropriation provided for herein will be of tremendous help in strengthening the Koreans in their desire to retain their independence, and the Koreans do not fear any Russian threats. I have been at all times in favor of aiding all peoples and countries who are seeking their freedom and independence. Consequently, after talking with many people who know the true facts, as I said before, although I was first opposed to this bill, I came to the conclusion that it will be of tremendous aid and benefit to the Koreans and to the United States as well.

Since I have not observed any real opposition to the rule, and as the House is well-informed on the subject, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5330) to promote world peace and the general welfare, national interest, and foreign policy of the United States by providing aid to the Republic of Korea.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5330, with Mr. BONNER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, it should be understood in the beginning that this bill (H. R. 5330) has, in the form of S. 2319, already passed the Senate. As passed in the other body it authorized an appropriation of $150,000,000 for Korean aid. That happened the first session of the Eighty-first Congress. The bill before you today, H. R. 5330, failed of consideration in the House at the last session of this Congress and is now called up at this session for the consideration of the Members of the House.

I am glad to say, however, that when the bill is read under the 5-minute rule I will offer an amendment reducing the amount called for in the authorization clause of the bill from $150,000,000 to $60,000,000. This reduction is authorized and justified by the fact that because of the failure of the last Congress to provide sufficient funds to carry the work in Korea on through the fiscal year 1950, the director of this aid in Korea was unable to do many things which could have been done had the money been available.

In other words, when the bill was first introduced in this House, the director of ECA operations in Korea was about out of money. He had very little available from former appropriations. He asked for $150,000,000 to carry him through the fiscal year 1950. This means from July 1, 1949, on through June 30, 1950. He failed to receive, and the Congress failed to authorize, the appropriation; but from time to time, in order to carry on operations in Korea that it was necessary to carry on, there was appropriated in piecemeal sections to this project the sum of $60,000,000 throughout the course of a few months.

The first appropriation amounted to $17,500,000. There was a second appropriation which I believe amounted to something like three to four millions. There was another appropriation which amounted to $30,000,000, and to the latter appropriation was credited or charged the former appropriations which had been given piecemeal. Altogether during the course of the last year, up until February 15th of this year, they had available for aid to Korea $60,000,000, which was insufficient to carry on the program to its full and complete extent.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEE. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. That brings me to the very question I was going to ask the gentleman at the beginning of this discourse. As I am informed the $60,000,000 that you propose to authorize by this bill was spent without an authorization, is that right?

Mr. KEE. This $60,000,000 is in addition to what has been authorized and appropriated heretofore.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. In other words they spent $60,000,000 which was unauthorized and when you use the word appropriation, it would be more appropriate to use the word allocation. They have allocated from time to time money which was unauthorized and have spent it.

Mr. KEE. No, the gentleman is mistaken. It was appropriated.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I wish the gentleman would explain what he means. Was the $60,000,000 which has been spent appropriated or authorized?

Mr. KEE. It was appropriated. It was not authorized through any operation or act of a legislative committee. But it was authorized on the appropriation bill which was passed by the Congress. Every cent which has been expended in Korea was appropriated before it was expended.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I beg the gentleman's pardon. This is an authorization and not an appropriation, is that not correct?

Mr. KEE. This is an authorization we are asking for today—an authorization of $60,000,000 in addition to what has been expended.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. If the gentleman proposes to cut this authorization from $120,000,000 to $60,000,000, why would that be necessary if they have already been authorized $60,000,000? Why bring in an authorization bill at this time?

Mr. KEE. We have no authorization for $60,000,000, none whatever. That is what we are asking for now.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEE. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. If the original $60,000,000 was actually authorized by the Congress——

Mr. KEE. It was appropriated.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. That is the $60,000,000 which has been spent?

Mr. KEE. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Then why is it necessary to bring this bill in asking for a total appropriation of $120,000,000, which would include the $60,000,000 which the gentleman just said had been authorized. The facts are that the $60,000,000 has already been spent.

Mr. KEE. Will the gentleman permit me to answer the question? I know what the facts are.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Well, let us have the facts.

Mr. KEE. The fact of the matter is that we are not asking for an authorization of $120,000,000. We are asking for an authorization of $60,000,000 to carry this work forward during the balance of the fiscal year 1950—from February 15, 1950, to July 31, 1950.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Do you not propose to offer an amendment—that is what we were given to understand in the committee—that you would offer an amendment to make this a total of $120,000,000?

Mr. KEE. I am offering an amendment to make this a total of $60,000,000.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Not $120,000,000?

Mr. KEE. Not $120,000,000.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am certainly glad to hear that. So it will be a total of $60,000,000 and not $120,000,000?

Mr. KEE. I join with my good friend in being happy about that.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEE. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. So that there will be no misunderstanding, the total will be $120,000,000, $60,000,000 of which has already been spent and obligated until February 15.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Then my understanding is correct.

Mr. MANSFIELD. There is $60,000,000 to come under this authorization, making a total of $120,000,000 for this fiscal year to be spent in aid to Korea.

Mr. KEE. But the gentleman from Ohio was asking about authorizations. It will only be $60,000,000 to be authorized. The other $60,000,000 has already been appropriated and has been used. There is no authorization except for $60,000,000, and the amendment will be offered to that effect when the bill is read under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. The gentleman says the total is $120,000,000. Which gentleman is correct?

Mr. KEE. That is it; what was appropriated last year.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. But not authorized?

Mr. KEE. It was never authorized by any legislative committee, as I have explained, was authorized by an appropriation in an appropriation bill passed by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The thing that disturbs me is that foreign commissions can spend money that is not authorized, but if you want to spend any money in the United States by any department, it must be authorized.

Mr. KEE. The appropriation authorizes its expenditure, and this Congress certainly appropriated $60,000,000 that has been spent. There has been nothing spent that was not authorized.

Now, it is unnecessary, I should think, for me to go into the advisability or the wisdom or the justice there is in our rendering aid to the Republic of Korea. It must be understood that the Republic of South Korea is a child of the United States and the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KEE] has expired.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself three additional minutes.

It was born through our efforts. It has been raised by our efforts. We established the Government of Korea as a free and democratic government, and it is the only free and democratic government existing in that area of the Far East.

Toward the close of World War II, the Japanese were driven to surrender, but it took no military operation to bring about their surrender in Korea. That is, it was not necessary for the United States to conquer the occupying Japanese Army.

Written into the terms of surrender is a provision that the surrender of the Japanese Army in Korea would be taken by the Russian Army from the border of North Korea and Manchuria down to the thirty-eighth parallel of latitude, and that the surrender of the Japanese troops south of the thirty-eighth parallel would be accepted by the United States troops. At that time the Russian Army was poised on the border of Manchuria. United States forces were located in the far-off Philippines. It took the United States forces 1 month to get into Korea. The Russians were there on the border and immediately marched southward, and 1 month later, when United States troops reached Korea, the Russian troops had taken the surrender of the Japanese to a point even south of the thirty-eighth parallel, and had to be induced to retreat to the thirty-eighth parallel of latitude. That is the boundary line between the Russian-occupied part of Korea and that portion south of the thirty-eighth parallel of latitude that is now incorporated in the Republic of South Korea.

Together, the United Nations Commission and the United States Government, at the invitation of the people of South Korea, went in and organized the South Korean Government and have taken care of it ever since. May I, however, go back across the years and give you a brief story about Korea, beginning with the turn of the present century.

Prior to World War II, Korea, a peninsula jutting out from the east coast of China, had been governed for many years by Japan. The latter country established a protectorate over the peninsula in a treaty on February 23, 1904. At the close of the Russo-Japanese War, Russia conceded Japan's political, military, and economic interest in Korea and pledged that it would not oppose Japanese measures for its protection and control. Korea's emperor was forced out by Japan and replaced by a puppet in 1907 and Japan assumed entire control of the country. On August 22, 1910, Japan formally annexed the country and ruled it from that time down to the close of World War II.

After four decades of subjugation and occupation, Korea was taken from Japan by the terms of surrender at the close of World War II. It was not taken over by direct military operations. An order, issued by the Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers to the Japanese Government for effectuating the surrender, specified that Japanese forces in Korea north of the thirty-eighth parallel should yield to Soviet forces and those south of the line should yield to United States forces. Thus was first established the dividing line now separating the Russian controlled North Korea and the territory controlled by the free, democratic Republic of South Korea. At the time of Japan's surrender, Russian troops were poised on the northern border between Manchuria and Korea. The nearest body of United States troops was located in the Philippine Islands. Immediately after the surrender, the Russian army at once marched down from the north and took the surrender of Japanese troops throughout the northern portion of the country, and in fact penetrated to a point some distance south of the thirty-eighth parallel. While the Russians entered Korea on August 12, 1945, the United States forces had to be brought from the Philippines and did not succeed in reaching and entering Korea until September 8, 1945. The Russian forces in northern Korea, having occupied certain sections south of the thirty-eighth parallel, were finally induced to withdraw back to that dividing line.

The thirty-eighth parallel was first established as purely a military measure and for the sole purpose of administering the terms of the surrender. It had no permanent nor wider significance. It was not long, however, until the iron curtain had enveloped Korea north of the thirty-eighth parallel. When this phase of the matter appeared, the commanding general of the United States forces initiated a series of interchanges with Soviet commander attempting to lower or erase the barrier thrown by the Red Army across the Korean peninsula. No argument, however, prevailed with the Russian authorities.

As I have said many attempts have been made by the American Government to remove the barrier line established by the Russians. None have been successful. A joint commission was established by Russia and the United States, and this joint commission engaged in a time-consuming effort to remove all barriers between North and South Korea, but without success.

Following the complete failure of diplomacy and of all conferences, the entire matter was taken to the United Nations and the issues respecting the future of Korea were placed before the General Assembly. On September 23, 1947, the Assembly voted to include the problem of Korea in its agenda.

The United Nations appointed a temporary commission on Korea and this commission made an immediate visit to that country. Arriving in South Korea in January 1948, it held its first meeting on January 12. North Korea, still occupied by Russian armies, was barred to the commission. The Soviet commander even refused to receive a communication suggesting an appointment for a courtesy call. A satellite, the Ukrainian Soviet Republic, which had a representative on the commission, failed to send one. All efforts to enlist cooperation from the Soviet authorities in Korea met only with rebuffs and denials.

The temporary commission officially recognized its complete failure to attain its objectives and referred the matter back to a committee of the United Nations General Assembly. This committee thereupon instructed the temporary commission to proceed to carry out the United Nations program "in such parts of Korea as are accessible to the commission." Thereupon the commission announced that it would observe elections in such parts of Korea as were accessible to it and that elections would be held on the basis of adult suffrage and by secret ballot and with perfect freedom of speech, press, and assembly.

Because of the fact that not only United States officials but also the Commission were barred even from entering North Korea, the elections were held only in that section of the country south of the thirty-eighth parallel. For the first democratic election approximately 75 percent of the eligible voters in South Korea had registered. On election day, May 10, 1948, an estimated 95.2 percent of these qualified voters cast their ballots. This free election was held notwithstanding the obstructive efforts of the Communists, which included large-scale terrorism, violence, and threats.

In December 1946 a legislative body for South Korea had been established. The members of this body were selected by an indirect voting process customary in Korea, and to this body were added an equal number of delegates appointed by the United States military governor to represent various cultural activities.

After the legislative assembly was set up further steps were taken by the United States authorities to transfer all authority from Americans to Koreans. The development of self-government in South Korea became a concern not only of the United States but also of the United Nations. In August 1948 a new government set-up under United Nations auspices was established and ready to receive full authority by transfer from United States military government of all civil authority.

A new constitution was adopted in 1947 and with the election of Dr. Rhee as president on July 20, 1948, the new government was in full operation.

The temporary commission which had observed the elections held in South Korea reported to the United Nations General Assembly at Paris in the fall of 1948, and the United Nations recognized the new government as the only free government in Korea. The United States accorded full recognition to the government in 1949 and recognition has been accorded by China, France, the United Kingdom, the Philippine Republic, and other governments throughout the world.

As briefly as possible I have set out the facts in connection with the organization of the South Korean Republic and the reasons why the jurisdiction of that republic extends only northward to the thirty-eighth parallel. The action of the Soviets in North Korea was, of course, following the pattern of the conduct of the Soviet Government in respect to each and everyone of its satellites and countries coming under Soviet domination. Having once established its forces in northern Korea, having once taken over the country upon the surrender of the Japanese Army, having once been given an opportunity of domination, the Soviets firmly entrenched themselves north of the thirty-eighth parallel, and there they stand today defying every attempt to either move them or to agree with them.

On the other hand, in all that section of the country lying south of the thirty-eighth parallel, the influence of the United States is dominant. After accepting the surrender of the Japanese forces in that area, the United States military authorities at once initiated a movement to establish, not a protectorate under United States domination, but a free, democratic government participated in and controlled only by the Koreans themselves. We gave to this government every encouragement. We taught them the principles of democratic government and the know-how to enable them to conduct it in the democratic way. We maintained in that country sufficient military forces to insure the government against invasion or aggression from its neighbors until the government itself was able to resist any force likely to be sent against it. We have since that time withdrawn our military combat forces but still maintain in the country a military commission to which the officers of the South Korean army can apply for counsel and advice. Under ECA and other legislation of this Congress, we have been rendering economic aid to the government of South Korea. We have been of aid to them in building up their industrial plants and in increasing their agricultural activities and production. Today so far as food is concerned the Republic of South Korea is self-sufficient and is able to export food to other nations.

Unfortunately, however, the great bulk of the country's factories and industrial plants are located above the thirty-eighth parallel in North Korea now under control of the Communists. The electric plants formerly supplying light and power not only for the northern area but for South Korea, including a number of hydroelectric plants are all located in the Russian section of Korea, to wit north of the thirty-eighth parallel. In other words, the southern section of Korea is the great agricultural section of the country while the northern section has been and is the industrial section. In order that the South Korean Republic may grow and prosper and in every respect become self-sufficient, it is necessary that the government be aided, assisted, and encouraged to construct industrial plants as well as power plants to operate them. These are the things in which the American Government has been engaged and which we want to continue to do, to assist the only free and independent democratic nation now in the China area. To cut off not only our economic aid but also our military counsel and assistance and to turn this country and its people over to the Communist controlled northern government of Korea would indeed be tragic. Not only all of the Far East, but also the Middle East and the Near East—in fact all the world—has known for a long, long time that the South Korean Republic was born and established through the agency of the United States acting jointly with and within the framework of the United Nations. The world has known that we were the sponsors of this government, that we were responsible for its formation, that it was builded upon our principles and with our help, and should we abandon these people to their own devices at this time, our action would be looked upon not only with horror but with despair by the peoples throughout the world. We would be held up to the scorn of all nations as a nation that has broken its word, its promise and its commitments. We would be branded as undependable and unreliable, as a weak counselor and a weaker ally.

STATEMENT REGARDING ESTABLISHMENT OF THIRTY-EIGHTH PARALLEL LINE

The Foreign Affairs Committee looked thoroughly into the background of the establishment of the line along the thirty-eighth parallel which has divided Korea into two parts. Questions were raised as to whether the line had been established as part of the agreements at Yalta and as to whether it might not have been possible to have excluded Soviet forces from Korea entirely. The testimony of representatives of the Department of State and the Department of the Army shows the following facts:

First, the drawing of the line was as I have stated essentially a military decision. The sole purpose of the line was to define the areas in which United States forces and Soviet forces would accept the surrender of Japanese troops in Korea at the end of the war against Japan. When the Japanese offer of surrender came on August 10, it was necessary to decide immediately what forces of the various allies should take the surrender of the Japanese troops in the various areas of the Far East where they were. Our military authorities, in making their decision, had to consider the relative availability of Allied military forces in those territories. Soviet forces already were well into Manchuria and other Soviet forces were on the border between Korea and the Soviet Maritime Provinces. The great Soviet base of Vladivostok is only some 80 miles from the northeast border of Korea. On the other hand, the nearest American forces were on Okinawa, some 600 miles south of Korea, with some of the forces needed for movement into Korea as far distant as the Philippines, some 1,500 to 2,000 miles away.

In this situation the Secretary of War submitted to the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee on August 11 a draft of General Order No. 1, which it was intended that General MacArthur as Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers should have the Japanese Government issue to all of the Japanese armed forces. This draft of General Order No. 1 directed that the Japanese forces north of the thirty-eighth parallel should surrender to the Soviet commander in Asia, while those south of that line should surrender to the American commander. Following further consideration by the State-War-Navy Coordinating Committee and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Order No. 1 was submitted to the President on August 14 and following his approval was telegraphed to General MacArthur on August 15.

The second main fact is that, far from permitting the Soviet Union to take over part of Korea from which it could have been excluded, the establishment of the thirty-eighth parallel line actually held for the free people of Korea the southern half of the country, which otherwise might have been overrun by the Red Army. As I have said, Red army forces were already on the move in Manchuria at the time of the Japanese offer of surrender on August 10. They had already entered the northern part of Korea on August 12, while General Order No. 1 was still under discussion. It was only by virtue of this order prepared by the United States Government that the United States forces were able to enter any part of Korea to take the surrender of Japanese troops, and it was only by virtue of a brilliant and rapid operation covering up to 2,000 miles that General Hodge and his soldiers were able to land in South Korea on September 8, 1945 and accept the surrender of Japanese troops in that area on the following day. Some idea of the size of this operation may be gained from the fact that it would be comparable to starting troops from Cuba or Haiti, staging them in Florida, and landing them in Nova Scotia.

In the third place, there is no evidence whatever of any agreement or arrangement arising out of the Yalta Conference, or any wartime conference, relating to the division or joint occupation of Korea.

Finally, it should of course be thoroughly understood that the division of Korea and the movement of United States forces into Korea was never intened to be for a long-term occupation. This was a development which resulted from the persistent refusal of the U. S. S. R. to agree to the establishment of a united and independent Korea upon terms which would do justice to the aspirations of the Korean people for freedom and national independence.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD].

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, we have before us today the question whether we should authorize $120,000,000 to assist Southern Korea.

It is my understanding this amount is but a part of a 3-year program involving approximately $400,000,000.

Before considering whether this bill should be passed, I feel we should not only look at the over-all aid we have already given foreign countries but also the aid we have given Korea to date.

In a statement prepared by the Legislative Reference Service of the Library of Congress, the total postwar aid given from July 1, 1945 to January 1, 1950 to all foreign entities amounts to $33,070,200,643. And according to this same tabulation, Korea received $238,652,893 between July 1, 1945 and June 30, 1949. This does not include military agency disbursements such as military pay and allowances in foreign areas, supplies and materials, dependency payments, transportation services, overseas cemeterial expenses, and so forth.

Since that time Korea has received an additional $60,000,000 and also $24,927,596 from the Foreign Liquidation Commissioner. Furthermore there has been earmarked for Korea $3,000,000 under the military assistance program.

When this bill was under consideration last July I joined with four others of my colleagues on the Foreign Affairs Committee in a minority report in which we pointed out the folly of rendering this assistance under existing circumstances. At that time we said:

> To expect Korea to withstand the aggressive political tactics of the Soviet in a surrounding climate of rampant communism, would be to expect an isolated and powerless Luxemburg to repel the ideology and the tactics of a Hitlerized Europe. * * *
> The proposed program is a double-bitted ax, and one which may well be turned against us in the future. Already, along the thirty-eighth parallel aggression is speaking with the too-familiar voices of howitzers and cannon. Our position is untenable and indefensible.

Since that time the march of events in the Orient have only strengthened my belief that this proposed action would be putting money down a rat hole. If the island of Formosa, located over 100 miles from the mainland of China, cannot be defended against aggression as contended by Secretary of State Dean Acheson, how much less could South Korea be defended being the tail end of the peninsula, with guerrilla activities in North Korea and Communist control in Manchuria?

As we pointed out in our minority report:

> Korea is hopelessly outflanked by the adjacent land mass of China, and the peninsula has no connecting link with any friendly continental power. Every ton of supplies contemplated to be furnished under the terms of this legislation must be transported vast distances, only to be put down in the midst of a complex and daily shifting Pacific picture, in which the rapid and undeterred spread of communism is the salient feature.

The testimony before our committee disclosed that Korea was not considered as vital to our security program. This testimony disclosed that even with the economic aid proposed during the next 3 years Korea would not be self-sustaining. Therefore, this help would not aid this country militarily or insure the economic security of Korea. The evidence also disclosed that there was no commitment to give this aid.

In my judgment, to furnish this aid under these circumstances would be like treating a hangnail on one's finger when the arm was swollen with poison from the wrist to the shoulder.

While an amendment will be offered from the floor to cut the original amount of $150,000,000, in reality it will not be a substantial reduction but merely takes into account the $60,000,00 that was appropriated last year.

When we take into consideration that we have spent over $33,000,000,000 in foreign aid since July 1, 1945, and largely because of that fact we have had to continue deficit spending, it might be well to seriously consider just how much further and how much longer we can continue spending these vast sums. In the case of Korea I think the time to stop is now. This bill should not pass.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, I am interested only in national defense, as far as Korea is concerned. I was a member of the subcommittee on public lands that visited about 22 islands, in addition to Hong Kong, and also the Republic of Korea. At Tokyo we were informed by General MacArthur's staff of the danger of world war III. There is no use camouflaging the danger. We were informed how we got into this danger. We put ourselves there.

But that is water under the bridge. We were put in that position when our Presidents were advised and counseled by Dean Acheson and Hiss and others to go to bed with Stalin and betray not only our own country but the world. I have no confidence whatever in anything that Dean Acheson says. But I still feel that we owe some obligation to the Korean people that we put in the position they are in, and also to realize that our war is in Asia, not in Europe.

I have noted with some surprise that members of the Foreign Affairs Commitee who have so lavishly thrown the American dollar all over Europe where there was no war, who have voted to finance inefficient and, in some cases, dishonest governments, now say that if we give a little money for national defense where the war is really going on it is unconstitutional.

When I was in Tokyo we were shown in MacArthur's headquarters that the division of Korea was very unfortunate and dangerous to us. We gave North Korea to Stalin. It had the hydroelectric power and the coal mines, and the Russians immediately shut them down and would not let South Korea have any electric current, so South Korea needs money to reestablish their hydroelectric power and reopen their coal mines and get access to these coal mines.

We were informed in no uncertain terms that Russia was supplying arms and training North Korea, and we were also informed that we were doing the same for South Korea. That is the situation that exists there today. We are in Korea; we have General Roberts there training the Korean soldiers. The guns and things they have for defense are American. We are going to continue to stay there.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I am sorry; I have but 5 minutes; I cannot yield.

Mr. Chairman, that is the situation. We are there now. Are we going to withdraw? Are we going to throw another nation to communistic Russia? That is the whole question. Or are we going to call a halt and take a stand for the people who still believe in peace and not in aggression?

What did we find when we went to Korea? We found an intelligent, a patriotic people there, a people who believed in us, a people who were friends of ours—far more so than any that we can find in Europe. In addition, we are responsible for the position they are in. We agreed to turn part of their country over to Russia. We were told by the highest officials in Korea that if we would let them alone they could reunite their country that we so cruelly divided and that belonged to them.

Of course there is civil war between these two factions. The Communists go over in nightly raids of the South Koreans; but the South Koreans have 22,000,000 people and the North have only 9,000,000. The South Koreans can take care of themselves unless Russia steps in.

When Russia steps in, if ever she does—and I hope she will have brains enough not to—then world war III is on, and we need not camouflage it. We will then have at least some responsibility somewhere in behalf of the American people and of the people of the world as far as communism is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BURNSIDE].

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Chairman, we did not give North Korea to the Russians. The Russian troops took that area and they had extended much farther in South Korea, but we have them back over to the thirty-eighth parallel now.

I just recently returned from Korea. The Hoover Commission recommended that five make this trip to the Far East in order to examine the expenses, the way in which we were spending our money in that part of the world. Five of us made that trip and I think the group was unanimous in its opinion that the money was being well spent in Korea. I do not know of any exception to that report.

We had a most wonderful reception from the people of Korea. More than 750,000 Koreans greeted us at the airport, along the way, and in the city. That is a very large group. One thing we were constantly impressed with was the sincerity of the Korean people. They were very, very sincere in their desire to maintain the independence of Korea.

Mr. Chairman, Korea is the only Christian country in Asia. All the Christians here certainly should think about endeavoring to the best of their ability to maintain the only Christian country in Asia.

We saw a large number of people who had come down from North Korea to South Korea because there was a democratic government in South Korea and we also saw troops that had deserted from the North Korean forces, who came down to the south. We reviewed some of these troops. They wanted to fight for democracy. They were held in tow by the Communist forces in North Korea, but they broke away from those forces and came south, and joined the South Koreans.

The Republic of Korea must not be ignored in a consideration of our present status and future policy in the Orient. The United States has a moral commitment to see that the Republic is able to stave off any full-scale North Korean Communist invasion, and they are perfectly able to do that.

We saw many of the 60,000 troops which are exceptionally well equipped in small arms. They had their arms very well cleaned, their equipment was in excellent shape, which is the sign of a good, well-trained trooper. These men paraded excellently. They do need more ammunition to practice with. They are doing a good job. Our fellow West Virginian has done an excellent job in training these troops. General Roberts has done an extremely good job in training them.

As I stated, the United States has a moral commitment to see that the Republic is able to stave off any full-scale North Korean Communist invasion. We have done that in equipping these 60,000. There are also another 60,000 men who are trained much like our National Guard and they are ready to go into the breach if necessary. In addition to that, they have 10,000 men in the cities who are trained and there are more than 2,000,000 Koreans in the Youth Corps who are able to take up any type of equipment they can get in order to defend their native land.

I have never seen a more sincere people, a people who are more anxious to fight for their independence than are these Koreans.

Under the terms of an agreement we made with the Russians, the United States occupied South Korea after the war while Russia occupied the northern half. The Russians have withdrawn their troops and left behind a strong North Korean army and a Communist government. We withdrew our forces last summer. This was a year after a democratic election was conducted by a United Nations Commission in the southern zone as the result of a resolution introduced into the General Assembly by the United States. Russia would not allow the conducting of such an election in the northern zone. I may say also that in the north there are now 9,000,000 Koreans while in the south there are 21,000,000 Koreans. Last year there were more than 2,000,000 who came from the north to the south to join the south in its fight for independence for Korea, really true independence, not one under the domination of the Communist forces.

Because the thirty-eighth parallel iron curtain divides Korea into two zones which are normally dependent upon each other economically and industrially, the Republic continues to need United States aid in the form of ECA grants. The fact that the Republic has used wisely the aid given to it so far has been attested by both officials of the ECA and our congressional mission which visited Korea recently.

The people of south Korea are eating more and better food than ever before in their lives. They are even going to be able to export a little in 1950. This is absolutely essential to their economy.

Passionately patriotic, they have their own national government, now a year old, and there is every indication that the overwhelming majority would like to be loyal to it. They wish to be left at reasonable peace on their farms, where 80 percent of the people live and work by standards that have advanced little in several centuries. Here is where our technical assistance can be of tremendous aid to these people. I might say that it has already been of tremendous assistance to these people.

Under American leadership, followed reluctantly by the recent National Government a land-reform program in South Korea has well nigh wiped out farm tenancy. By doing this we have tremendously strengthened their desire to fight with all their might for these new landed peasants to keep their farms. The Korean peasants stand today as landed proprietors, with rents and taxes lower than ever before. They have a keen desire to fight to maintain democratic institutions. More children are in South Korean schools than in all previous history. Illiteracy which was a lot of almost 90 percent of the Koreans up to 1945 is vanishing fast.

If ever there was a subject lesson in the grandeur of national political independence as a stimulus to the human spirit, it is in South Korea today. As the situation now stands South and North Korea comprise a significant area in the Far East in which democratic and Communist principles and ideals are being tested side by side in two parts of what is normally a single country. This test is being watched by all Asia.

Last June the Economic Cooperation Administration appeared before the Foreign Affairs Committee to explain:

(a) The total aid requirements of Korea.

(b) The purposes to be served by this aid.

(c) A forecast of the effect which these aid supplies would have on the Korean economy.

I need not remind the Members of Congress that we did not authorize the $150,000,000 which the Foreign Affairs Committee, after careful investigation, recommended to the Congress.

By reason of legislative accidents Korea has received a total of $60,000,000 for 7½ months, rather than $75,000,000 for 6 months. In short, we have granted 64 cents on each requested dollar.

With these seriously restricted funds, nonetheless, ECA has been able to cling to its basic purpose—which is to assist in the economic recovery of Korea. It has taken great prudence to cut back every dollar by 36 percent and yet avoid an abortive retreat into a purposeless relief program.

For the most part ECA has met this fiscal stringency by a program of preparatory deferment.

(a) It has gone ahead with recovery projects that it could afford.

(b) It has accomplished the preengineering planning of those projects which it was most reluctantly compelled to defer.

The plain facts of the matter are that the Korean program has been delayed in time. Moreover, the incidence of this delay has fallen on the critical recovery portions of the projected program.

The Members of Congress will be the first to recognize that one cannot embark on a capital-installation program with uncertain funds, made available in small increments. The House will recall that the Korea program received a total of $60,000,000 for 7½ months; and that it never had the assurance that it would receive that much. Actually it received:

Seventeen million five hundred thousand for 6 weeks.

Then nothing for 6 weeks.

Then $12,500,000 for the barren 6 weeks.

Then nothing for 10 weeks.

Then $30,000,000 for the 10 fallow weeks and for the next 9 weeks.

Under these circumstances, it is quite clear why only modest progress could be made on engineering and reconstruction projects.

Yet, these recovery projects are the key to the Korean problem. For they are the only means whereby Korean imports can be reduced, Korean exports increased, and the Korean balance-of-payments problem resolved.

Yet, what amazes me is the record of how much has been accomplished in the course of ECA's first year of operations. Thanks to their great efforts, the Koreans have more than met their targets in industrial production.

ECA has been able to fulfill the promises it made to the Bureau of the Budget and to the congressional committees with regard to Korean exports.

Korea has gone twice as fast in her railway building program than we had any right to prophesy by reason of the industry, the enthusiasm, and the imagination of the Koreans.

ECA could not have dared forecast the operation of Yongwol power plant at 44.5 kilowatts.

Here is an example of Korean energy, perseverance, and will to succeed. Korea has more than met the projections for coal production, a most difficult task. All these things have been accomplished because there has been—

(a) A tremendous effort on the part of the Koreans.

(b) Judicious use of available supplies.

(c) An energetic effort at improvising.

(d) Wonderful cooperation between Americans and Koreans.

(e) A firm attitude on the part of the Americans that the Koreans must use their best efforts.

Take, for example, the export of rice. This was not an easy task for the Koreans. It was loaded with political dynamite. It took perseverance on the part of the Americans, courage on the part of the Koreans. And yet, sooner or later this step had to be taken. The American view was that it should be taken this year.

ECA has not done all it had hoped to do. On the other hand, in terms of funds, it has done more than we had any right to believe it could do.

In preparing the supplemental 1950 program, ECA asked the Koreans to supply an accurate inventory of the supplies they have on hand. Acting on that request a national inventory was made in the summer of 1949. It was on the basis of this inventory that ECA presented the request for a supplemental appropriation of $65,000,000 to the Bureau of the Budget (dated December 12, 1949).

When the director of the Korea Division of ECA was in Korea in late November 1949, he importuned the Prime Minister to ascertain beyond question the amount of aid supplies in Korea. This he agreed to do. Since the preparation of the budget request (dated December 12, 1949), ECA has received the findings of this second inventory. It reveals the following information:

(a) That fertilizer supplies (to which ECA had given procurement priority) are larger than had been expected.

(b) That raw cotton inventories are much smaller than ECA had believed.

(c) That certain savings can be made in lumber which had not been anticipated.

(d) That a portion of the essential materials for railway construction are available in Korean inventories.

Against savings, however, must be placed certain deficiencies now very clearly revealed:

First. Manila fiber stocks are all exhausted, and some 6 months will be required to restore basic inventories.

Second. Sulfite pulp is in short supply.

Third. Cement stocks have been exhausted, both for general use and for recovery projects. Here procurement time is 3 months.

Fourth. Creosote stocks are exhausted at the very moment when the building of railway extensions calls for supplies to treat the new ties that are being laid.

Since the submission of the supplemental request on December 12, 1949, the Korea Division of ECA has examined and reexamined the minimal requirements that are necessary to sustain the Korean economy.

The outcome of this reexamination of Korean requirements—in view of existing, definitely determined inventories—is that we now believe that a genuinely effective program for the remainder of fiscal year 1950 can be provided by $60,000,000 rather than $90,000,000. This means cutting every item to its very minimum.

The 1950 program has been reduced from the original request of $150,000,000 to $120,000,000 for the following reasons:

First. An unprecedented drought increased the production of salt so that all salt imports for fiscal year 1950 could be eliminated.

Second. Nitrogen requirements, originally calculated at 110,000 were reduced to 106,000. This reduction in requirements is a result of a careful screening of Korean requests based on careful experiments in the capacity of dense paddy land to hold nitrogen longer than is normally the case.

Third. Curtailed consumption resulting from more stringent controls allowed a programed cut-back of petroleum.

Fourth. Delay in reopening the Sam Wha iron works—from lack of funds for rehabilitation—made possible the elimination in fiscal year 1950 of coking coal.

Fifth. Certain industrial chemicals, programed in finished form, are now scheduled in crude form because of the improved situation in the Korean chemical industry, thus saving dollars.

Sixth. The circumstantial availability of safe-haven cotton from China has made possible the elimination of certain marine textiles.

Seventh. Unavailability of funds for fishing boats has resulted in a cut-back in total lumber requirements.

Eighth. Ropes and nets programed originally in finished form are now programed as materials with a material saving.

Ninth. The largest cut-back occasioned by unavailability of funds came in recovery projects.

With only 4½ months of fiscal year 1950 remaining—after February 15—it is obviously impossible to launch as comprehensive a type of recovery program as was originally planned.

Progress in the use of Korean anthracite has similarly been greater than we had anticipated. The increased use of briquets, for railroad and industrial purposes, has augmented the need for coal-tar pitch, but saved Korean balances in Japan.

I think it will be evident from what I have said that the (a) Korean Government, (b) ECA mission, and (c) Korea division have studied and restudied the Korean program, adjusting it to changing circumstances not merely from week to week as performance was revealed, but from industry to industry in terms of a reappraisal of visible possibilities. There has been not only a willingness to economize, but a constant search for savings. ECA has cut back its personnel from 275 to 225, and will continue to cut. Above all, there has been a performance by the Koreans which has been far better than we had any right to expect.

At the same time, ECA has been able to get more certain estimates of the engineering costs of recovery projects. Detailed and precise engineering data is available now that was not available last June:

(a) Day & Zimmerman.
(b) International Engineering.
(c) Allis-Chalmers.
(d) Roberts & Schaefer.
(e) Gilbert Associates.

Experts in the field have checked all estimates—see below:

(a) Jones: Combustion.
(b) Giroux: Power.
(c) Crentz: Coal beneficiation.
(d) Naef: Marine base.
(e) Selheimer: Technical training.
(f) Andrews: Geological survey.
(g) Pierce Management: Coal.

I think the House will appreciate that, in the face of what happened in China, one cannot afford to be extravagant in any statements.

But in all sincerity, the Korea program is really accomplishing its purpose. In those areas where funds have been made available, it is ahead of schedule.

Mr. Eric Biddle, who is not given to careless statements, told Mr. Hoffman and his staff—after he had visited the ERP countries—that, in his opinion, the United States Government was "getting more for its money in Korea" than anywhere else.

What are the reasons:

(a) There are no generalities in the Korea program. Specific things for specific purposes are purchased.

(b) Technical supervision by Americans insures that the specific commodities are put to their best use.

(c) ECA does not hesitate to modify requirements. And that works both ways—it has cut back more often than it has increased.

(d) We have an ECA mission that knows its job, whose morale is amazingly high, one that knows when to give the Koreans leeway when they are doing a job, and to needle them when they are not.

(e) Finally, we have a Korean Government that knows that it must succeed or fall victim to Communist expansion. Do not underestimate this will to succeed. It is the key, not only to the future of Korea, but it may be the key to the future of the Far East.

One would not be honest, however, if one painted the entire picture in roseate colors. Whereas the agricultural, the industrial, the mining, the transportation, and the foreign-trade outlook is most promising, the fiscal situation is disturbing to the State Department, to ECA, to Washington, and to the American mission in Korea.

Money in circulation has risen at an accelerated rate since the elected Korean Government took over the government.

The overdraft at the Bank of Chosen has expanded dangerously.

Prices are still rising despite the inflow of ECA supplies and the dramatic increase of domestic production.

Revenues are lagging behind expenditures more than ever before.

There are one or two things that should not be overlooked, however:

First. That certain financial risks must be taken in order to cultivate industry and stimulate a greater volume of business activity.

Second. That the increase in money in circulation is almost exactly proportionate to the increase in industrial production.

Third. That the new nation had to assume responsibility for its own military force when the American Army forces withdrew.

Fourth. That only when Korea is politically secure will it have the capacity to borrow abroad or induce capital investment by foreigners.

Fifth. That the state-owned factories, mines, and other vested property have not yet been sold or alienated but many presently will be.

We should not, by any neglect on our part, let this situation get out of hand.

(a) ECA has laid an 8-point program before the Korean Government.

(b) State Department has sent instructions to Ambassador Mucci to make it abundantly clear to President Rhee that the Korean Government must put its financial house in order if it expects further American aid.

(c) ECA is presently recruiting two outstanding authorities on public finance to, first, work out with the Koreans a precise plan of expenditure control; and, second, show them precisely how the tax system can be made more efficient and productive.

Nor is financial reform entirely a matter of future action. Reforms are already being made:

(a) Prices of ECA goods are being steadily advanced to more realistic levels.

(b) Counterpart deposits are being increased in rate.

(c) Transportation rates have been markedly increased.

(d) Electric rates were doubled as of January 1.

(e) Ten billion won of short-term bonds are being sold to Korean purchasers.

(f) More rigid controls are being imposed on bank loans.

(g) Plans are being finalized for the reorganization of the Bank of Chosen.

(h) The legislature has passed, and the President has signed, a law which will make possible the sale of vested property.

Much more remains to be done, but important steps are already being taken.

A recovery program in a context such as the Korean one must be a race between expanding expenditures and expanding production. Without the first, the second cannot occur.

The immediate task, therefore, is to insure that economies will be made in the unproductive areas so that local currency can be made available for the recovery program without adding a net inflationary element.

If you wish to help the Christian people of Korea to remain as a nation among the nations of the world, here is your opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Chairman, the tragic state of the Korean people today cannot but move to pity those who seek freedom, happiness, and peace for men and women everywhere who have suffered under and continue to suffer under the bondage of totalitarianism. Quite rightly, we are concerned with the plight of those who are our spiritual allies in this world-wide global fight which today keeps all nations and all peoples in a state of constant turmoil and uncertainty.

However, it is not alone the people of Korea or the Korean Republic whom we must think of in these trying times. We must likewise think in terms of the substantial welfare of the 150,000,000 American people. Our ability to help and assist nations and peoples in distress is not measured alone in terms of our financial and physical resources. If the defeat of the forces of world chaos were simply a matter of logistics, of transportation, of communications, then, indeed, the price asked in this legislation would be a small price to pay for the confusion and the defeat of our common enemy.

However, Mr. Chairman, the problem with respect to Korea is much more complex than this. There are physical factors and geographical considerations which render the proposed program not only one of the most hazardous we have ever undertaken, but one which is less likely to succeed in the final analysis, than any other program of which I have any personal knowledge.

First of all, let us place Korea in its proper geographic perspective. As the map will indicate, Korea is no Greece, flanked by an allied Italy and a friendly Turkey. Korea is already half behind the iron curtain, severed in two at the thirty-eighth parallel. Dominant in the northern half of this tragically divided country are the Communist forces in North Korea. The other portion of the country, representing the Republic of South Korea, is the portion of the map which is colored blue. Here is the Ongjin Peninsula where sporadic fighting has been in progress for many, many months, and will doubtless continue on an increased scale in the future. It will be noted that South Korea is hopelessly outflanked on the west by the adjacent land mass of China, and that the entire line along the thirty-eighth parallel is open to full-scale and unrestricted warfare at any time.

In addition to that, large bands of guerrillas at the present time are harassing the southern portion of the Republic. Korea is by no means in a serene and placid state. South Korea has experienced a series of severe constitutional crises which continue to this very date. Inflation is rampant. The country is truly in the last stages of an economic disease which it is questionable can be cured by any amount of money.

The arrows on the map indicate some very interesting points which should be taken into consideration by this committee in its contemplation of this legislation. What is our practical position relative to the supply of capital goods and commodities to South Korea? As the arrow indicates, South Korea lies 7,000 miles west of San Francisco; 7,000 long and tortuous miles, over each mile of which must be carried at a tremendous expense every ton of supplies contemplated in the proposed program. The amount allocated for freight charges alone in this bill represents 25 percent of the total appropriation. Twenty-five percent of the money appropriated by this Congress will go up in exhaust fumes before the last of the cargoes is landed.

Another reference point for the information of the committee is Vladivostok 500 miles to the north. It is quite obvious that in any economic or political challenge to supply contesting forces in the north and the south, that we would be at a decided disadvantage as represented by the difference between 500 and 7,000 miles.

The third of the arrows, and perhaps the one most important from the Soviet standpoint, is the one which indicates the direction of and the distance to the Russian industrial area east of the Urals. It is inconceivable to many of us that the Communists would countenance the maintenance of such a threat to their productive capacity. Two years ago—even a year ago—the Republic of South Korea might have managed a precarious and uncertain tenure, but if anything is likely or certain in this world today it would appear to be the eventual engulfment of South Korea by the rampant forces of communism, which in their drive through Manchuria and north China have left Korea unsupported and tragically isolated.

It is not my desire, Mr. Chairman, to debate the China problem at this time, but it is impossible to consider Korea except as it relates to the physical and political conditions surrounding it. There is no counterpart in recent legislation for what is here proposed to be done in the instance of Korea. Here is no wide and defensible belt of interlocking states, no community of common ideas and cultures such as have rendered possible the success of the European recovery program in western Europe. All of the factors which made possible the putting down of guerrilla activities in Greece are missing in the case of Korea. Greece found a Tito willing to close his common frontier in return for the favors which could be obtained from the west, but no such quid pro quo can be expected along the thirty-eighth parallel.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, one can admire and respect the South Koreans in their period of dire tribulation, but to fatten the prize for an ultimate conqueror who at this moment holds all of the trumps is neither kindness to Korea nor justice to the American taxpayer who must foot the bill.

Much will be said during the course of the debate on this measure of our obligations and our commitments with respect to the establishment of the Republic of South Korea. Too little will probably be said of the failure of the Soviets to carry out their implied obligations. But circumstances alter cases and we have only to refer to our repudiation of our traditional open-door policy in China to see that fact clearly. Too, we were a party to a declaration and a commitment which guaranteed the maintenance of a free, friendly, and democratic China. Certainly China has never been less free, less friendly toward us, and less democratic than is the case at the present time.

But assuming that we have made commitments to Korea and that a moral obligation did exist when those commitments were made, we must still consider that the color and the shape of political things have since been radically altered. What was once a friendly coast to the West now serves the same enemy as faces the Republic on the north. To expect South Korea to resist the political and military infiltration which is the constant dread of every nation in western Europe is, quite frankly, to expect the impossible.

Our resources are not unlimited. The necessity of conducting a world-wide operation for the containment of aggressive and godless communism requires the careful husbanding of our financial and physical means. Within a very few days or weeks this body will be called upon to consider the so-called point-4 legislation for the development of backward areas throughout the world. We must put our resources and our help not only where our hearts dictate but where our heads tell us the national security and the national welfare are at stake.

South Korea is no Japan, no Okinawa, no Philippines. Not one word of military testimony is on the record indicating the essential nature of the peninsula in the plans for the national defense. To the contrary, it has been stated time and again that from the military standpoint South Korea is indefensible and tactically isolated.

The pending legislation might stand the test of urgent necessity if it were proposed as a part of an over-all policy for the United States in the Far East, but such is certainly not the case. The development of such a policy is admittedly one of the most pressing requirements of the moment, but it will never be initiated with South Korea as a reference point. South Korea is exactly what the map shows it to be—a small peninsula separated by 7,000 miles of ocean from the mainland of the United States and completely surrounded by the raging tides of international communism.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I believe that it is valid to say that the case for Korea cannot by any measurement other than that put forth as a commitment stand upon its merits. This commitment is brought to the Congress not as a subject for discussion and debate, but as a fait accompli which we are told we must ratify, although we have taken no direct action or legislative step which constituted a pledge or a promise on the part of the Congress of the United States. This is the last in a long series of diplomatic commitments, arrived at on the basis of discussions far removed from the legislative branch, commitments which we are told we must honor with never-ending appropriations from the Federal Treasury.

South Korea is a Bataan without a Corregidor, a Dunkerque without a flotilla, a dead-end street without an escape. If the Congress wills it we shall invest in a gambit of pawns against an opponent whose major pieces are skillfully jockeyed against both South Korea and the United States on terrain chosen by our opponent and on terms which he alone will dictate. Let us be humanitarian, but let us not close our eyes to reality in a day when the fate of a world depends upon clear judgment and straight thinking.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUBER].

Mr. HUBER. Mr. Chairman, I recently had the very great honor of being chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures that visited Korea several months ago. I did not find conditions there exactly as they have been described by some of the Members who have occupied the well and have not had the opportunity to see conditions first hand in Korea.

If you ever want an excuse to vote against a bill, this would be an easy bill to vote against. If you want to go back home and demagogue about it and say, "I voted to save the taxpayers money," it is an easy thing to do on this bill. But I think it might be penny-wise and pound-foolish. I think you ought to give it just a little bit more thought.

We have made definite commitments in Korea, commitments that we must keep. Our committee worked very diligently while we were there. We did not depend on the so-called cocktail circuit to get our information. We talked to and interviewed people right down to the smallest person we could find, and we also talked to Ambassadors and State Department officials. Everything we could find out about Korea was good.

Not long ago I attended a press conference. Somebody said, "How about all the political prisoners that are in prison there?" I said, "I have it on very good authority that is not true." This newspaperman said, "What is your authority?" I gave the name of one of the outstanding news reporters in the world, who was the authority for that statement. So some of these things that we have heard are just not true.

We have a great many people who would propose that we send men and money to certain places in the Far East. In supporting this measure you are not asked to send men there, you are not asked for armed intervention, you are asked only to give financial support, financial support that is desperately needed.

I know when we returned last fall, joined by the other members of the committee, I went to the leadership and spoke to the leadership of the House. At that time we realized there was some doubt as to whether even the $30,000,000 appropriation would be passed. I said at that time to the Speaker, "If we are not going to follow through, let us send a cable to President Syngman Rhee, and send it immediately, and tell him that no help is coming, that he might as well make the best deal he can with the northern Communist forces and not sacrifice those gallant young men who are wearing the uniform of that new Republic over there, trying to hold that beachhead of democracy."

I think this is very important legislation and should be passed. I hope that Members will not use this as an opportunity to demagogue but will realize the commitments we have, and will not break faith with the Korean people. In effect we are their sponsors. We have helped them to set up their Government. That Government is a going concern. It is a good Government, and it is destined to be a great democracy. If you want to help them, then I know you will help to pass this bill.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUBER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. VORYS. The gentleman from North Dakota said a moment ago that he heard in MacArthur's headquarters that we were going to defend South Korea, and if the Russians attacked it world war III would start there. Did the gentleman from Ohio receive any such information?

Mr. HUBER. I think if all the rumors we hear that are attributed to General MacArthur's headquarters were laid end to end, it would be a good thing. I do not know.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen who argue here against this aid to Korea, I think, are the very same gentlemen who have been most eloquent and most vocal in arguing for a positive foreign policy in the Far East on the ground that is where the whole civilized world is likely to go down the drain. They have argued that the loss we are in a way suffering in the Far East would be a loss even greater than the loss we run the risk of suffering if we lose Europe. Yet these same gentlemen have voted $5,000,000,000 and $3,500,000,000 and will probably vote again about $3,000,000,000 this year for ERP to Europe. The demand for a positive policy for the Far East, in the face of the opposition to the $60,000,000 in this bill for Korea, sounds hollow. If the committee will look at the Mutual Defense Assistance Act—Public Law 329 of the Eighty-first Congress—which the Congress passed and which the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported out, and fully backed, it will find that the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House has provided a positive far eastern foreign policy. That policy is expressed as follows:

> Congress hereby expresses itself as favoring the creation among the free countries and the free peoples of the Far East of a joint organization consistent with the Charter of the United Nations to establish a program of self-help and mutual cooperation designed to develop their economic and social well-being to safeguard basic rights and liberties and to protect their security and independence.

In other words, this is a call for a far-eastern recovery program. Of such a program. South Korea is an integral and absolutely essential part.

That is a positive far-eastern policy; and now as a means by which to hold these 21,000,000 people in South Korea for 6 months, until there can be a positive far-eastern policy—to spend $60,000,000 to hold 21,000,000 people in the Far East in reserve for the great positive policy—these gentlemen say "Oh, no."

Let us examine the arguments made against this bill. The first argument is that Korea is a very long way from the United States. The second is that it is indefensible militarily. I ask these same gentlemen whether Korea is any more indefensible militarily than is Berlin. Berlin is an isolated island in the very heart of the occupied zone of Germany where we have few troops.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I am sorry I cannot yield now.

Mr. JACKSON of California. The gentleman is asking for an answer to a question.

Mr. JAVITS. I wish the gentleman would permit me to go on at the moment and I will yield later, as I permitted the gentleman to do.

Mr. Chairman, Berlin is an island in the Soviet Zone, surrounded on all sides by Soviet troops. Every military man and every commentator has said that the Soviet could push us out of Berlin by military action at will. But the Soviet has not pushed us out of Berlin, nor will it, any more than the Soviet will seek to push us out of the areas we occupy in the Far East at will, because she knows that means war.

It is not what military forces we have there. It is not General Roberts, with his 500 officers, that are going to hold the Soviet, but it is the unwillingness of the Soviet Union to attack us.

Then consider the outposts of United States security. Have the gentlemen forgotten that we are basing our security in that area today on Japan and Okinawa, which are directly flanked by South Korea? I say to the gentleman if we are driven out of there in 6 months, or if we should be driven out of there in 6 months, with the incalculable stakes which the advocates of a positive China policy say we have in the Far East, it is still worth $60,000,000 to take this opportunity to save these people.

A great deal has been made here of the economic situation of Korea. Certainly the economic situation of Korea is bad. Why? Because we have not followed through on the recovery program needed to help their economy. That is why she has been working her printing presses. They have no other way to sustain their economy except as they get this very support from this very bill from the United States. The circulation of Korean money has doubled in the period from March 1949 until today. Why? Because we have not aided them. It is not because they are fundamentally wrong in Korea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. JACKSON of California. The gentleman has mentioned the Korean situation in relation to Berlin. I should like to ask the gentleman in what respects he considers the situations to be at all analogous.

Mr. JAVITS. I think I made that very clear. I said that in Berlin today we do not have any military force which is able to resist the Russians if they wanted to roll over the western sectors. Yet we know very well that the Russians will not roll over our forces in Berlin, for the same reason that they will not in the Far East, because they are not willing as yet to accept the gage of battle.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. VORYS. The gentleman said, "If we are driven out of Korea." The fact is we are out now.

Mr. JAVITS. That is not so, so long as the lawfully elected Korean Government is there.

Mr. VORYS. I thought the gentleman meant our military force.

Mr. JAVITS. We have a military mission still in Korea.

Mr. VORYS. Our military force has been withdrawn and we were told it was withdrawn so we would not become involved. Is that not correct?

Mr. JAVITS. We withdrew our military force in response to a request from the United Nations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. DOUGLAS].

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, there are two movements in the world today. One, the forward march of the non-self-governed peoples toward independence. Second, the struggle between Communist and democratic ideologies in the world. We will strengthen democracy to the extent that we give leadership to the non-self-governing peoples of the world so that their people may be truly free and their nations may be independent. I think that the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee are agreed on this.

Korea was under the domination and government of Japan for 40 years. The country is today divided. I do not have time to go into that. But because we moved fast, at the end of the war, we are in half of Korea today. If we had not moved fast we would not have been in Korea at all.

We have a 3-year program to help the southern half of Korea to be independent and self-supporting. We hope it will work out that way. Korea has 21,000,000 people who have the stamina to stand on their own feet and to fight and work for freedom. If we abandon them today, as the Secretary of State said, we can be sure that in 2 or 3 months they will collapse, economically, which will mean that the Communist forces in that southern part will take over, and all of Korea will then come under a Communist government—and Russian influence.

We cannot guarantee that this economic program will insure a democratic Korea, but we can be sure of what will happen if we do not help them.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield for a question?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The Chinese were marching toward democracy under Sun Yat-sen, but something happened to reverse their direction in recent years.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. That is right. They were marching toward democracy, but then there was a terrible war, a devastating war, and unfortunately the leadership of China was not able to retain the confidence of the Chinese people.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Does not the gentlewoman think the same thing can happen in Korea?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Anything can happen. We are trying to prevent the economic collapse of southern Korea.

Here are 21,000,000 people who want freedom and are looking to us to help keep them a free and independent people. This sixty millions economic aid that we are about to vote on we believe will give them the chance they ask.

The Korean situation, remember, is under the direct supervision of the United Nations at this time. So bear in mind that it is not quite the same kind of situation that you could have in some other places of the world.

It was just stated that there was testimony before our committee by representatives of the Joint Chiefs of Staff that the present armed forces in southern Korea, trained by American military men, are quite capable of putting down any internal revolt, any Communist revolt in southern Korea, and are capable of withstanding any pressure from North Korean forces, unless a major power starts an open war. They did not say that they could withstand a war started by a great power, but should war start, that would be an international issue which would come before the United Nations. As my colleague from New York has just said, it would be hard to imagine that Russia would intentionally provoke any such war at this time with Korea under the glaring light of United Nations attention, and, in fact, with a United Nations commission in Korea at this time.

I wish to read to you what the President said in his message when he sent the Korean bill to us last year:

> Korea has become a testing ground in which the validity and practical value of the ideals and principles of democracy which the Republic is putting into practice are being matched against the practices of communism which have been imposed upon the people of North Korea. The survival and progress of the Republic toward a self-supporting, stable economy will have an immense and far-reaching influence on the people of Asia. Such progress by the young Republic will encourage the people of southern and southeastern Asia and the islands of the Pacific to resist and reject the Communist propaganda with which they are besieged. Moreover, the Korean Republic, by demonstrating the success and tenacity of democracy in resisting communism, will stand as a beacon to the people of northern Asia in resisting the control of the Communist forces which have overrun them.

This is what the President has said about the positive effect of carrying out this program. Now let me read you what the Secretary of State testified about the negative effect of failing to carry out this program:

> If you do not take this step, it seems to me that it is a public declaration that we are not going to do anything in the Far East, and I think you will get a shiver of fear all through the Philippines, all through southeast Asia, India, and all the other parts of the Far East, which would be quite unjustified, because we are not taking that attitude toward those areas. If we do not do what we can do, and just say it is all hopeless, * * * we are bound to have accentuation of a disintegration which has taken place instead of a pulling together in many areas, where I think we are getting very definite signs that there is a pulling together and a stiffening.

I want to add to that only that eyes of hundreds of millions of people in southern and southeastern Asia are on the United States, constantly questioning whether they can safely continue to give us their confidence or whether they should turn elsewhere. The action of this House today, our decision to help the people of Korea in their fight for independence, or to abandon them to slavery, will be our answer to their question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from California has expired.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentlewoman from California one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from California is recognized for one additional minute.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Here are a people wanting to resist communism. We feel that they are able to if we give them this economic aid. We know they will go down if we do not. This is the only foothold we have in northeastern Asia. Is it worth the gamble or is it not? It seems to me very emphatically that it is. Our military men feel so, the ECA feels so, the State Department feels so, and the President of the United States feels so; and that is enough for me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from California has expired.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON].

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, we of the Committee on Foreign Affairs have given a great deal of study to the vast problem presented by the Far East. There are a number of us who have been very deeply saddened by the complete failure of the administration's policy over a period of years as far as China is concerned. This failure has not been caused only by what has happened in the last 4 or 5 years, it dates back at least to the early thirties. From that tragic moment in 1932 when we failed to protest the taking over of Manchuria by the Japanese; every move that we as a nation made has been unfortunate, whether we acted from ignorance, from a partial knowledge, or from a refusal to face facts.

There are very few people in America today who do not feel that China always has been and still is the very center of and the key to the peace of the world. My very able colleague from California [Mrs. DOUGLAS] spoke a moment ago of the understanding that is necessary if we are to have a peaceful world. That leadership must be given. The peoples of the world who are struggling up from difficulty and ignorance, who are freeing themselves from foreign domination do need leadership. This is so throughout the world, and unless we find a way to give them leadership they will fall into hands that will make the world a very unsafe place for us and for all the freedom-loving people of the world. It is quite impossible for us to separate our future well-being and our future security from that of the peoples of all continents all over the globe. I am not saying it is my opinion that we should give and give and give without any question, without any attempt to curtail extravagance, or to limit the misuse of funds. My record in this House will make that very clear to everyone. But I do feel very strongly that there is a force far greater than the military force, a force that comes from the hearts of a people.

Mr. Chairman, I ask you if there is any country in the world that has so illustrated the strength of that inner courage of that inner power than the little country of Finland? Finland has been the only country to pay her war debts to us. Finland has been the only country that has stood firmly for democratic forces regardless of anything that was done on her borders.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield? I want to ask if Finland received ECA help?

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Finland, I believe, paid her debts to us. I have had the pleasure of lunching today with one of the Representatives in the Finland Parliament, Miss Pohjali, who has been in this country at various times during the last few years. To our great joy she told us that the situation in Finland is steadily progressing, that life has returned almost to what it was before the war, that the people are beginning to breathe more freely again. Why? Because of the inner courage they have displayed.

Being a mother—and may I say this in reply to a question of a colleague of mine a few moments ago—I know that no child is ever helped by too much assistance, too much ease, too few demands upon his own strength. I am in complete agreement that no nation is helped by similar methods.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentlewoman from Ohio two additional minutes.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, wisdom must be used, judgment must be used and, above all things, mothers know that one must never break a promise to a child.

We set up this little Republic over there, surely our responsibility is not over.

My colleague from California suggested that if we had not been as fast as we were, we would not have had half of Korea. I would remind her that we have had testimony showing that if we had been able to get there a little faster, we would have had more of it. But, our troops were too far south for us to get them there before the Russians could reach the thirty-eighth parallel.

Here is this little Republic fighting its way. We know well that the best soil for communistic control is starvation and discouragement. Above the thirty-eighth parallel they have the power plants and they have all the ease. If we give help to the South Korean Republic to put up power plants near the coal mines, they can then mine their coal, they can also build and run railroads, there is every possibility that that little seed will grow into a very thriving country.

I would urge strongly that this House vote for this $60,000,000. I agree that $60,000,000 might do more somewhere else, or that we may be preparing something for the Kremlin to take over. But, Mr. Chairman, we heard that same argument over Greece and Turkey. We heard the same argument about Europe generally: that we would just be getting everything ready for the Kremlin to walk in and take over. Well, the Kremlin has not walked in at any of those points.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Does the gentlewoman think that it would have been possible to achieve victory in Greece on the basis of economic aid alone, without some considerable element of military aid which was given to them?

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. We did it piecemeal, if the gentleman remembers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Ohio has again expired.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may desire.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened to these very able and learned discussions from the financial point of view, much of which is beyond any comprehension that I possess. But, I approach this problem from a point of view of my own which I have followed for a long number of years.

I have been a student of the great forces that make human history, and I feel confident that we are here assembled today in the most tragic, difficult, and challenging hour of human history and that these tremendous issues are complicated beyond words by the emergence into the influence of public policy throughout the world by about a billion and half of brown people in the Orient.

Mr. Chairman, the situation is tragic from our American point of view, because, if under the leadership and world program of the Russian Communists they are able to mass against a handful of free, white folks here, such as we are, with our traditions of democracy and self-government behind us, if they are able to amass a force of from a billion and a half to two billion of people against us militarily or economically or any other way, how are we going to maintain the civilization and the wonderful blessings inherited by us from our fathers? So, for this reason I feel that our policy in the Orient has been a most disastrous one in recent years, and I look upon this little group in the peninsula of Korea as the last toe hold we have on the Asiatic Continent at the present moment. These people are worthy; they have a great history. Two thousand years before Christ they had a great civilization, a great religion, a great literature. They are a fine people. There are 21,000,000 of them. They inherit a fruitful and fine section of the world. They have the shadow of Russia over them all the time. Russia, taking the north half of this peninsula, has seen to it that it runs up contiguous to Siberia, so that it is a continuous portion of Russian-dominated territory and will continue to be.

For the reason that we are now face to face with a world challenge which sooner or later will have to be decided by a terrific sacrifice, perhaps, of men and treasure, I do not want to see this country at this moment withdraw from the one spot in all of dark Asia where people are struggling to be free and where they have a right to expect our help and our assistance.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. EATON. For a question.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Does the gentleman think our Navy should have intervened when the Chinese Communists turned their artillery on that English ship and drove it out of China?

Mr. EATON. I will be glad to take a day or two off sometime and discuss that question with the gentleman, but it has nothing to do with this subject.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. I am afraid it will take a good deal longer than a day or two to settle that.

Mr. EATON. I know the gentleman enjoys chasing intellectual rabbit tracks but I will not join him at this time in that practice.

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. NORRELL. I endorse every word the distinguished gentleman has said. If there was ever a bill that ought to be passed by this Congress for the assistance of a nation that is really trying to help itself, this bill is it, with the amendments the committee will recommend.

Mr. EATON. I have always had the highest regard for the gentleman's ability and intelligence, but it goes even a little higher at this moment. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I understand this money is to be dispensed through ECA; is that right?

Mr. EATON. Yes. The ECA is there carrying on, and I suppose will continue to carry on. That is one of the most successful and practical administrations of funds we have ever had.

Mr. GROSS. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that. The ECA in its fifth report to the Congress on September 15 said in connection with counterpart funds that the Korean Government had collected from importers only half of its bill for ECA-financed goods. Are importers collecting from the Korean people and then not paying the Korean Government? Does the gentleman know about that?

Mr. EATON. In regard to the specific question about the lag between the making of counterpart deposits and collections from end users of the assistance—I believe that 59 percent is the current figure for the portion collected of the value of goods furnished.

In part the government of the Republic of Korea has to subsidize the sale of goods to the end users. This practice is diminishing as stability increases and the threat of inflation abates. However, the government of South Korea puts the equivalent of one whole cost—both the sale price and the subsidized portion—into the counterpart deposit. This accounts for part of the discrepancy. The rest of the discrepancy is accounted for by normal lag between billing and collection.

Mr. STAGGERS. Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for this bill. Our United States Government has made definite commitments to the Republic of Korea, and I feel in all fairness we must keep faith with these people who are making such a magnificent struggle to take their rightful place among the nations of the world. Korea is fighting its battles under tremendous odds and now is the hour of destiny for them and their fight for freedom—and they need a friendly helping hand.

Korea is standing almost alone in the world today as a nation which is actively fighting communism. It is in a virtual state of war. Attacks occur almost daily along the thirty-eighth parallel and the depredations of the guerrillas who have infiltrated even to its southern provinces are a severe drain on Korea's economy. They are particularly costly because Korea is holding a defensive position which is more expensive than maintaining an offensive. It is essential that Korea not only maintain a minimum subsistence level, but it must have a margin of safety and enough food and industrial supplies to tide it over an emergency and enough economic rehabilitation at least to give hope and encouragement to the people of Korea.

Industrial and social development has progressed tremendously since the government of occupation has gone out of Korea. They have plenty of labor—all Korea needs is more equipment and material with which to work.

We do not want Korea to go along the road the rest of the Asiatic countries have. I feel—and it is the opinion of men who should know—that if Korea is given this aid now, she will be able to withstand the onslaught of the Communists and will be able to stand as a first line of defense in the far-eastern waters.

Korea is industrious. She has proved her loyalty, and Korea is most appreciative for the help which has been given. There is no sign in her weakening.

With adequate aid Korea could be considered a strong and secure outpost of freedom and decency in a chaotic world.

I urge each and every Member of this House who believes in the inherent rights of mankind to enjoy the rights of liberty and freedom on this earth to vote for this bill.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, there is not much I can add to the debate which has already gone on. But I am pleased that the debate has been on such a high plane that we have stuck, generally speaking, to the question of aid to Korea. As my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Ohio said, this is an easy bill to vote against. This is an easy bill to demagogue about. This is an easy bill to vote against because you can say you are doing it in the name of economy. But before you do so you had better think of your responsibilities as American citizens and you had better think of the welfare and security of your own country.

This country was responsible for the setting up of the Republic of South Korea. You and I know that if this aid is not forthcoming the American-sponsored Korean Republic will not be able to stand on its own feet very long. You must know that just as we took a calculated risk in entering into the European recovery program so you will be taking a calculated risk in this program for Korea.

The choice is pretty definite—the decision is up to us. In my opinion, a vote for this measure is a vote to strengthen our hand in Japan—northeast Asia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired. All time has expired.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Korean Aid Act of 1949."

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do want to bring some observations before my colleagues about Korea, because in company with three Members of the majority side I had an opportunity to visit Korea this last November. Our committee has issued a report and while I am not free to tell you what is in the report it is in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations and some of you may be able to read it there.

I do want to comment briefly on some things that have been said here on the floor of the House. The gentlewoman from Ohio spoke very highly of Finland. I agree with her 100 percent on Finland. Finland made a great recovery. But I would point out to my colleagues who are voting for ECA funds that Finland did not get any help from the ECA funds. The countries that have made the greatest recoveries are those that did not get help. England is a country that has the lion's share of help and she is coming back for more billions.

If that is the history of what happens to countries that have gotten ECA help, then I would like to have more countries like Finland.

Now, as to Korea, I would like to read a letter, or part of a speech that the chairman of the National Assembly gave to our committee when we were in Korea. This is what he says, in part:

> While other material supplies are highly important for the rehabilitation of Korea, the American military aid can be considered most important and urgent to her. We have no munitions and arms with which to fight the aggressors. We do not expect other people to defend our country. We want to defend it with our own lives; but to do so we must have arms. God helps those who help themselves. We will sacrifice our lives for our country. Therefore, we are earnestly appealing to the United States for aid and munitions.

I think that is very definitely the thing that they want.

I would point out to you also it is not the food situation in Korea that is urgent, because I read from page 33 of the Report on Aid to Korea:

> It is estimated that the 1950 crop will enable Korea to provide for its domestic needs and to export some 200,000 metric tons of rice. This contrasts with exports of 100,000 metric tons from the 1949 crop.

So it is not food. What we are doing in this bill, as I understand it, is to put in some heavy equipment. We are supplying electric-power plants, dams, irrigation districts to irrigate, according to the report, 235,000 acres of land. We are supplying fertilizer plants. I am not revealing any secret when I tell you that our military commission in Korea, the officers and men under General Roberts who are helping to train the Korean Army, made the statement that it is not a question of if the Communists were going to move, but when they would move in.

In such an attack South Korea can only last 8 or 10 days. Well, are we going to put a lot of heavy, permanent improvements in Korea and let the Communists then take it over?

I note in the December 30 report of the ECA that we have appropriated or made available to Korea $10,450,000 for an electric-light plant in Korea.

Korea has other troubles besides machinery, and it is mostly military, because they are going to get along without all of this economic aid. They might need some fertilizer, and I think probably they do. I would be willing to see that they had some fertilizer. They do not need the rice, because they are exporting rice.

But with reference to the money situation in Korea, I happened to be there in 1935 and 1936. The yuan was worth about four to the dollar. We were there last November, and I believe it was 450 to the dollar officially, but on the street you could get 950 or 1,000 yuans to the dollar.

Another reason I hesitate to vote for this bill is that the defense dollars in our own country are definitely limited. We are spreading it pretty thin. If we are going to have real defense of our country, perhaps we had better take this $60,000,000 and defend Okinawa or the Philippines or Japan. The State Department and the War Department have written off Korea as a lost cause. Look at the map that Dean Acheson presented in his address to the Press Club the other day. It did not include Korea. Korea is written off.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MILLER] has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, as I have listened to the debate, I have been trying to learn just what our responsibility is in Korea. It seems to me that there has been only one point made, and that is that we have a moral commitment—a moral commitment. I am wondering if we had a moral commitment to the boys who are today buried in the South Pacific. We have heard no word from the Democratic side of the aisle as to what occurred in China, and yet we went to war in defense of China. We talk about this cold war——

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I do not yield. I have only 5 minutes. You had 5 minutes and I did not interrupt you.

I call to your attention that, try as we may, and as fine as our ideals and our concepts may be as to our responsibility to the Koreans, we cannot lose sight of the fact that under the bankrupt policy of our State Department and this administration we are losing the cold war.

In 1945 there were 190,000,000 under Communist domination. In July of 1948 there were 480,000,000. In January 1950 there were 800,000,000. And why? Because we have been following the identical policy that has occurred in China, and now, after the horse is gone we are going to lock the door in Korea. The horse is gone. Everyone who testified, among the military men especially, there was not one bit of testimony to justify our continued interest, militarily, in Korea.

What is asked for in this bill? The statement is made that we are asking for $60,000,000. Mr. Chairman, understand, this legislation calls for $385,000,000.

Just a short time ago, just a week ago we had before our committee a distinguished member of the State Department. In fixing the limitations of our responsibility he indicated that what we should do was to confine our interests within the limitations of a certain arrow running from the Philippines to Japan, and then to the Aleutians. There was not one word as to the value of Korea, not one.

I say to you that as far as a moral commitment to Korea is concerned we should encourage the Koreans, but we are going so to encourage them that we pour in $385,000,000 and build up civil establishments only to have the Communists from North Korea walk in and take them over? That is what we are preparing for; that is what this money will do.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The gentleman mentioned the figure of $385,000,000 Korean aid. Will the gentleman explain his statement?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will refer to pages 27 and 28 of the report he will there find the figures set out: In the year 1950, $150,000,000; in 1951, $115,000,000; in 1952, $85,000,000; and in 1953, $35,000,000. That is the report from our own committee. That is what we are talking about—$385,000,000; not $60,000,000, as has been said. It seems to me it is about time that we talk and act for our own people. Our taxpayers are entitled to some consideration. This is absolutely "operation rat hole." It will be said, of course, that that is demagoguery, but if that be demagoguery, make the most of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, those of us who support this legislation providing aid to Korea believe that it is in the interests of the American people to do so. Although Korea would not be strategic in case of another war—nevertheless, Korea is important to the security of the people of the United States. We hope that in Korea we can help build a sound democratic nation that will be an example to the people of Asia. Show them that it is possible to have not only security but freedom as well.

We are playing for very high stakes; we are playing for a world in which freedom and a decent standard of living will be enjoyed by all people. We want a democratic world, not a totalitarian one.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I cannot yield at this time. I want to say to the gentleman, whom I respect very greatly, that those of us who support this bill do so in the broadest sense, and that is for the good of the American people. We believe that it is not in the interest of the American people to turn our back on Korea now that China has come under a Communist government. We do not believe it wise to turn our backs on this new Republic, which has given every indication that it has the resistance needed to withstand communism. Shall we give up the one foothold we have in that part of the world, where our voice can be heard, where the way we behave can be observed and judged in relationship to the way the Russians behave by the other peoples of Asia? Shall we do that?

The gentleman talks about the amount of money involved. This program may be cut as we make progress. It is a lot of money, but what happens if we do not spend it? There is the question, What may that cost in the end?

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Did we not walk out on China?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. No; I do not agree with the gentleman that we walked out on China. I do not agree at all that we walked out on China. We gave aid to China and did everything we could to support the Nationalist Government of China, but that Government lost the confidence of the Chinese people; that is a hard fact.

I do not think we should walk out on China now. I think we ought to be very careful not to turn China over lock, stock, and barrel to Russian influence. How do we prevent this? Certainly not by going to war.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. The gentlewoman would not say that the Communists do not control China today, would she?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. I would say that the leadership in China today is Communist, yes, certainly; but if the gentleman means by that that Russia controls China today, I do not think that he can make a case for that. We do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Has not Mao Tse-tung been over to a conference at the Kremlin in Moscow?

Mrs. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. He is taking his orders from the Kremlin, from Russia?

Mrs DOUGLAS. That does not prove that China is lost behind the Russian iron curtain for all time. This is not the first time that Russia has had her finger in China and has given advice to China. Sun Yat-sen turned to Russia for advice in the twenties when the Western World would not come to the aid of his non-Communist Revolutionary Party.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin. Even the white paper says that he had to take over.

Mrs. DOUGLAS. White paper or no white paper.

We can save Korea if we act now; we can help it economically, perhaps politically. I think we should.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from California has expired.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, to continue the line of argument which I was following at the time of my previous remarks, I should like the Committee to consider further the matter of Korea with relation to the national defense of the United States. In my opinion, we are not justified in doing anything in this world today unless it furthers the enlightened self-interest and the national defense of America. Again, if that be demagoguery, make the most of it.

It is unfortunate that from time to time when one takes an honest, sincere position out of a very deep conviction, it is deemed necessary by some who hold other views to refer to his stand as demagoguery.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON of California. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. MANSFIELD. On the map the gentleman showed in his previous discussion, I notice he made a comparison between Korea and what it was surrounded by, and Greece and what it was surrounded by, but the gentleman did not have a map of Japan to the east of Korea showing that the difference, as far as separation is concerned, is nothing but the Chosen Strait between Korea and Japan. Is Japan in its present shape, occupied by us, necessary to our security; and if it is, then what is the position of South Korea pointing right at the heart of Japan?

Mr. JACKSON of California. The position of South Korea, if one may take the words of the military experts who testified, has absolutely no strategic position with reference to our national defense; nor is it contemplated that South Korea would be defended by the United States in the event of armed aggression. It is untenable; it is outflanked; it is not within the consideration of our national defense to defend it in case of attack, and that testimony is in the record.

What kind of a policy in the Far East could be predicated upon Korea and the geographical location which it occupies? What kind of a policy for the Far East would put economic aid into Korea, which bears no relationship to our national defense, and at the same time refuse a request to put aid into Formosa? Formosa is essentially a point in the line of defenses which include Japan, the Philippines, and Okinawa, all essential and vital to the national defense of the United States. Formosa is a tenable position; it is a position which might well be held; it is a position, certainly, which should be strengthened if we are going to have any kind of policy at any time in the Pacific area.

Now, to commitments. The gentleman from Ohio has pointed out that there is no commitment with respect to Korea. It was stated very clearly in the testimony before the committee that no commitment, no promise, was ever made with respect to the Republic of South Korea. It is very strange that a commitment was not made, because we have been confronted on many occasions since I have been in the Congress with a never-ending series of commitments, diplomatic commitments, in which the legislative branch, that body having responsibility for expending public funds, has had no part. It seems to many of us that the time has come when the Congress should be consulted more frequently with respect to foreign commitments which entail expenditures from the Public Treasury. We do have paramount commitments to the American people and, again, that is not the statement of a demagogue. We have a continuing responsibility to see that the public funds in the United States Treasury are expended wisely, and only in those places where we may expect to receive the greatest possible return for them.

So, the case for Korea, aside from the emotional approach to the Korean problem, cannot stand on its merits as essential to the national defense, or as in any manner as being related to the national security of this country. Our resources, financial and physical, are by no means unlimited. It is true that I have supported the expenditure of many billions of dollars in those areas of the world where there appears to be a hope of success; but only on those occasions where there appeared to be a reasonable hope of success. Calculated risks are one thing, incalculable risks are quite another matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last several words.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with one of my preceding colleagues who said that the debate on this bill has been conducted on a very high level, and I hope that it will continue to be discussed on that level, and that the debate will confine itself mainly to the issue involved in the bill, which is whether or not we will provide economic assistance to the people of South Korea, thereby strengthening their political institutions against Communist aggression.

Korea is one of the newest free nations of the world. Forty years under foreign domination, now 18 months as a Republic and a sovereign nation, it has done a remarkable job in government.

As an illustration of the ability of the present Government to function and maintain internal order against the forces of aggression from within, it has put down two armed Communist uprisings during the past 18 months. The Government is stronger and more stable now than at any time during the past 18 months.

Some Members of the Congress have expressed doubts, and properly so, I think, as to whether or not the new Republic can resist external aggression against border attacks of Communists.

The important fact is that such forces have not made gains, and the internal military forces, the militia and the police, of the new Republic have been able to resist the border attacks that have been made by the Communists of northern Korea. Southern Korea can resist any attack by northern Korea. That has been testified to by the highest military authority of our country, and I think it was testified to before the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Suppose the Soviet Union attacked southern Korea, what then? Of course, that would be different. If the Soviet Union did attack, it would do so at a calculated risk. However, as I see it, it would not be different than if the Soviet Union were to attack other countries in Europe that we are now assisting, the probabilities are that if such an attack were made, which would probably mean war, it could take over those countries. So it is not a matter of southern Korea alone. That would be taken over in the event the Soviet Union itself moved, but the same situation would apply to other countries we are assisting.

The question is, With the power of America as it is, and I hope the power of America will be stronger, would the Soviet Union take the calculated risk of a fighting war rather than the cold war in which we are now engaged?

While I am talking about power, there is only one respect the Communists have or that any Communist nation has, as I see it, and that is respect through fear, where there is a greater power than themselves. That is unfortunately so, but as it is a fact, I believe that we and the countries associated with us in the North Atlantic Pact or under any other relationship should be more powerful than the forces of communism throughout the world.

Should we fail to act in the case of southern Korea, the last foothold of democracy in northeast Asia will be lost. The retention of southern Korea as a free people and an independent nation is of vital importance to us for a number of reasons. A Communist southern Korea will be a direct threat to Japan. One of my colleagues referred to that in a question he asked. It will also be a direct threat to our interests in the Philippines and in Okinawa, and in the Aleutian Islands.

To those of us who stand for affirmative policies in the Far East and elsewhere, failure to pass this bill, in my opinion, would be a matter of vital importance. Therefore, it seems to me that those who favor intervention in Formosa in one way or another should be the strongest supporters of this measure.

For one thing, it is quite probable that if the southern Korean Government receives no assistance from the United States, the chances of that Government's retaining its sovereignty and of its people retaining their freedom and resisting communism are slim. I do not say that they cannot resist. I would not say that about any people or any other nation. It would be too presumptuous on my part. But I make the statement and express my opinion that their chances, without our assistance in this economic rehabilitation and political strengthening, would be very slim.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, the passage of this bill is in the national interest of the United States, in view of our world-wide considerations. I hope the House will pass this bill.

Mr. DEANE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I was interested a moment ago in a comparison. I do not wish to make comparisons between distinguished Members of the House, but I recall that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MILLER] took an opposing view to this bill, whereas the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL] urges the passage of this bill. These gentlemen were in Korea some months ago. For the benefit of those who may not have heard his statement earlier in the debate, the gentleman from Arkansas, a conservative member of the Appropriations Committee, stated: "If there is any reason to vote for a measure for relief, this is the one bill that should pass."

I realize that in view of the gradual increase in our present recovery programs we need to recast our thinking on economic aid to foreign nations. This new approach which, in my opinion, promises so much is through the President's point-4 program of technical assistance and the encouragement of private capital to enter these countries.

As a member of the congressional committee mentioned by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HUBER], I desire to point out that of the several countries we visited in September and October, which included Indochina, Indonesia, Thailand, Burma, and Korea, I can in all frankness state that we did not see in any of those countries the military power comparable to what we saw in Korea. Let me make this observation: All too often we forget and fail to appreciate the splendid services of our personnel who are administering this program in Korea. I recall our able Ambassador, John Muccio, as well as Dr. Arthur C. Bunce, director of our ECA program in Korea. These men and their faithful staffs are performing an excellent job. I recall Dr. Oscar Underwood, as well as Dr. Ned Adams, outstanding missionaries who have served in Korea for many years, who spoke so affectionately of members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. They mentioned in particular Dr. EATON, as well as Dr. JUDD, and several other distinguished members of this committee.

These faithful servants asked that we come back and urge the Congress to pass the assistance contained in this bill and thus keep faith with the Government and people of Korea.

We have already committed ourselves to great projects in that country in the way of hydroelectric developments and other programs. To cut off the funds at this particular time would cause us to lose the value of what we have already put into the country.

It has been said that this particular country is not prepared, militarily speaking. I remember talking personally to President Rhyee. I asked him this question: "Mr. President, is there any chance your army may move out before it is ready?"

He spoke immediately and said: "We are prepared now to resist the aggression of the northern Communists."

Furthermore, if we fail in this particular effort there will be repercussions not only in southeast Asia, but throughout the world.

Furthermore, I am convinced that we will be breaking faith with the Korean people, with that nation which today stands out so far ahead of any other country in southeast Asia.

I am confident, if the United Nations will take a firm stand, so far as aggression from north of the thirty-eighth parallel, together with our continued assistance economically speaking, Korea will withstand the assaults from the north.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, the defense of our people continually raises in my mind the location of two triangles which I shall illustrate by the map that is now being placed before you.

In times past, and prior to World War II, we substantially thought in terms of a triangle which runs from Alaska down to Honolulu and back to the Panama Canal. When we got into World War II we expanded our liabilities considerably by reason of the success of our gallant youth under the leadership of General MacArthur, and we moved from American Samoa, below the equator, down in this general area which I point out on the map back through the so-called trusteed area into the Philippines, Formosa, and Okinawa, and on to Tokyo. Since the end of World War II we have been thinking in terms of a new triangle which runs from the tip of the Aleutians down through Japan, embracing southern Korea, on past Okinawa in the general vicinity of Formosa, down through the Philippines, down through the trusteed area to the Panama Canal.

The whole question in my mind with respect to national defense in the far Pacific is whether or not we want to maintain that second triangle. If we do not want to maintain that second triangle, unbroken—and by that I mean running from the Aleutians, through Japan, Okinawa, Formosa, the Philippines, the trusteed area, with as much support from New Zealand and New Guinea and Australia as we can get, and on into the Panama Canal—if we do not want to maintain that second triangle, I think the head of every Member of this House ought to be examined and exposed to the people of this country.

I have as little patience with Secretary of State Dean Acheson and his position on Formosa as a person could have with anything on earth. To me it is the most ridiculous performance that has ever occurred in the history of our State Department.

It has been my privilege to visit through this area a number of times. I am not a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee. I am not a member of the Military Affairs Committee, and the information I have got I have to pick up as best I can from dead reckoning and from the contacts that I make. As far as I am personally concerned, I am ready to dedicate everything that I have in human blood or otherwise, to hold that second defense line against all forces that might oppose this country, directly or indirectly. By that I mean to say I have little patience with any person who advocates the breaking of that line. To say to our people from time to time that we ought to contribute to western Europe in opposition to the spread of communism, as we have contributed since July 1945, and at the same time perform in the Far East, as we have performed, in my opinion, is an insult to the intelligence of the people of the United States.

Three years ago, while in Tokyo, I raised with our top officials this basic question: I said, "It is only a matter of months until the Congress of the United States will have to substantially decide whether or not it pulls out of western Europe or the Far East. When the pressure of events forces us to make that decision what in your opinion—I was talking to our forces in Tokyo—what in your opinion should we do? I am not going to quote what was said to me. Quoting these statements that are made directly to us by top-level military men does not amount to a hill of beans on this floor; yet the principal members of this committee will come to this floor and quote all that is said to them and expect us to swallow it without any consideration whatsoever. You can draw your own conclusions.

Here throughout the trust area we have assumed the responsibility for an area which covers approximately 3,000,000 miles of ocean area. Right there today we cover the trusteed areas, the Marshalls, the Marianas, the Carolines, and the Gilbert Islands. The load on the American people will aggregate billions of dollars in decades to come. Those are not going to be revenue-producing islands; they are part of your defense line, and that is why we took them on. Unfortunately, we tied it up with the proposition under the trust agreement with the United Nations Organization, and we must conform to that agreement instead of the judgment of the American people. The Russian agents can meet in the trustee council annually and puncture holes in everything that we authorize or do for the trustee area by reason of our sins of omission as well as our sins of commission. That whole area has got to be tied together through the acts of this Congress. Proposals will, no doubt, come before you between now and June 30 next; that situation is facing you.

We have practically ditched Honolulu and Pearl Harbor as bases by reason of what we are doing in Guam, Okinawa, and other points farther away. How can you defend the Nation unless you have your outposts? How can you hold this extended line if you give up Formosa? I wish some practical person would answer that question for me sometime. It is like playing a game of checkers: I have two men with a space between and my opponent comes between them. What is going to happen? I will lose one of those men just as sure as you know anything about the game of checkers. We are placing the agents of the Communist Government in between two of our men through our giving up Formosa. This breaks the line of defense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. It is hereby declared to be the policy of the people of the United States to continue, on terms consonant with the independence of the Republic of Korea and the security of the United States, to assist the people of Korea in their endeavors to establish a sound economy, to support the growth of individual liberty, free institutions, genuine independence, and representative government in Korea, to strengthen the ties of friendship between the American and Korean peoples, and to help to achieve the basic objectives of the Charter of the United Nations.

SEC. 3. The Administrator for Economic Cooperation is hereby authorized to furnish assistance to the Republic of Korea in conformity with—

(a) the provisions of this act;

(b) the provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended, wherever such provisions are applicable and not inconsistent with the intent and purposes of this act; and

(c) the agreement on aid between the United States of America and the Republic of Korea signed December 10, 1948, or any supplementary or succeeding agreement which shall not substantially alter the basic obligations of either party.

The Clerk read the committee amendments as follows:

Page 2, line 8, strike out "(b)" and insert "(2)."

Page 2, after line 16, insert a new section as follows:

"(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the Administrator shall immediately terminate aid under this act in the event of the formation in the Republic of Korea of a coalition government which includes one or more members of the Communist Party or of the party now in control of the government of northern Korea."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for this bill, despite some grave misgivings and full realization that there are several strong arguments against it which have real validity and cogency. In the first place, Korea is not essential to our security. No military man says that it is; every military man before our committee said that it is not. Also the Secretary of State last week, in a speech he made before the press club, is reported to have said that Formosa is not essential to our security because it is beyond a line he drew from the Aleutians through Japan and Okinawa to the Philippines. Korea is also beyond that line. If Acheson's argument regarding Formosa's dispensability is sound, then he himself ought to be opposing aid for Korea, too.

In the second place, South Korea is not tenable whenever there is any effort by Russia or her satellites to take it. I would like to quote the expert opinion of General Marshall on this point from the hearings 2 years ago when he appeared before our committee:

Representative JUDD. If North China and Manchuria should be taken over and organized by the Communists, do you think our position in Korea would long be tenable?

Secretary MARSHALL. I think it would not be tenable.

So you can properly argue, if you wish, that it is a waste of money to pour millions into an area which cannot be defended because of the situation we have helped produce in Manchuria and China, and an area which we have no intention of making the slightest effort to help defend. Furthermore, it may well be against the interests of Korean security to built it up industrially, making it so much more desirable a prize for Russia's agents to seize and use for Russia's interests and against our own.

A third argument you can give for voting against it is that there is reason to believe some in the State Department who sponsor the bill do not do so in good faith. Owen Lattimore, whose ideas unfortunately have probably had more to do with our whole Far Eastern policy in the last decade than any other one person's in America, and also with public thinking regarding Asian matters, wrote an article on this subject which was published last July 17 in the Sunday Compass, which is the successor to the newspaper PM and the New York Star. I should like to quote from it. He said, speaking about China:

The problem was how to allow them to fall without making it look as if the United States had pushed them.

As you know, that policy has been faithfully followed since 1946, although I do not think the State Department and the promoters of the Chinese Communists have been fully successful in convincing our people that our Government did not give free China a push.

He states further:

Korea is another chapter in the same unhappy story. I have yet to meet an American who knows all the facts and believes that Syngman Rhee is either a popular or a competent President of South Korea. In spite of high-pressure elections, his legislature is more badly split against him than China's was against Chiang Kai-shek.

The thing to do, therefore, is to let South Korea fall—but not to let it look as though we pushed it. Hence, the recommendation of a parting grant of $150,000,000.

There is no question but that there are people in the State Department who think South Korea is doomed as a result in no small degree of our own Government's blunders in this whole area which they want to cover up. They ask us to put up this money now so that if and when the day comes that Korea goes, they will have their alibi already prepared. They can then issue a white paper on Korea and say: "Well, we did everything we could, and Congress appropriated plenty of money. But the Government of Korea was just so incompetent and inefficient and undemocratic and corrupt that it failed to hold the support of the people and so collapsed before the Communists."

To those people this bill never was a bona fide effort to save Korea. It is a phony—an attempt to shift blame from themselves for the Communist conquest of Korea which they expect. If we make the money available, they can blame the Koreans; if we were not to pass the bill they could blame the Congress. In any case the primary aim to them is to get themselves off the hook in Asia, to get an excuse for their failure to save Korea all fixed up in advance.

There is a fourth argument against the bill. I myself feel our greatest need is for a positive, over-all consistent and defensible far eastern policy. China was important to such a policy, in fact essential to it; Formosa is vital to it. The Philippines, Japan, southeast Asia are all vital to it. South Korea is not.

Those are all valid reasons why you can oppose this bill. But despite those reasons—and I respect completely the integrity and sincerity of the Members who hold them—and despite my fear that as a result of our actions at Yalta and our inaction in China, the odds are against this young Republic and the difficulties we have helped pile up for it may prove beyond its strength, still I am in favor of passing this bill because the reasons for it outweigh those against it. First, it provides the only hope Korea has. I may think it cannot be saved, but I am not God, and Dean Acheson is not God, George Marshall is not God. Who can say for sure that Korea is doomed? We are responsible for the formation of this young republic, and we are duty bound to give it the best possible chance we can. My complaint about our Korea policy is that it does not provide enough. But if we cannot get our Government to adopt a really effective and comprehensive policy, at least I am not willing to tear away the only hope it has.

Second, I agree completely with the words of Dean Acheson appearing on page 47 of the committee report:

For us just to quit and walk out without giving these fellows who have trusted in us any possible chance to survive is just not a decent American thing to do.

I am sorry he does not agree with his own principles when it comes to China and Formosa. I wish he had reread his own statement before he and the President did to the Chinese on Formosa only 2 weeks ago what they ask us not to do, and I am not willing to do, to the Koreans. I refer particularly to those thousands of Chinese on Formosa, still unwilling to yield no matter what the odds. The weakest elements in the Chinese Government are gone, they have been sloughed off or defeated or defected. The best elements are in Formosa—many of them trained in the United States, almost the only men on the continent of east Asia who understand western democracy, our type of civilization, our free-economic system, and who are committed to them. Their crime was that they tried to orient China toward the west instead of toward the Kremlin. Now they are backed up against the wall in Formosa and we pulled the rug out from under them. For us to walk out on those fellows who have trusted us and not give them any possible chance to survive is just not a decent American thing to do. Besides, if they are liquidated, who will there be in China to try to turn her millions toward the West and freedom again?

If on top of the blow the administration has just dealt to the last hope of the Chinese, we here today walk out on the Koreans, what do you think it will do to the hearts and hopes and confidence in us of the other 800,000,000 human beings in Asia? On their decision depends more of our own future than we realize.

Just because Mr. Acheson has, in one case, China, done what by his own definition is just not a decent American thing to do, is no reason or justification for you or me to go and do likewise in the case of Korea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. JUDD. Just because the Secretary of State, in other parts of Asia, follows a policy which I feel is unworthy, indefensible, and disastrous beyond calculation to our country, is no reason why I should follow that bad example and unwise precedent. It seems to me that we have got to give Korea the benefit of the doubt no matter how big it be. We ought to give every possible assistance we can, because again and again and again it has been demonstrated in Asia that if, when things look utterly impossible or hopeless from any western standards, you give them moral support and sympathetic encouragement and just a modicum of balanced military and economic advice and assistance—not American combat soldiers—more can be done for less than anywhere else in the world.

I am willing to bet this much on Korea: I am willing to bet the amount of money involved in this in order to give those people a chance. It is, in part, a sense of moral obligation, in part a concern not to destroy what faith in us still remains in Asia, and in part to get a load off my conscience, or rather to try to atone for what I believe are the sins of our Government in Asia, for which sins we will eternally stand in judgment before God and before history. The burden of error and guilt which we carry is already heavy indeed. Let us not today make it heavier.

Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota has really posed the real issue to the House today. His statement should be considered together with the remarks of the gentleman from California. The gentleman from California said today that we are only interested in one proposition, and that is the security of the United States of America. There is a further consideration, and that is the good name of the United States of America. If this House throws South Korea to the wolves, we are jeopardizing the good name of the United States of America. Our Nation is responsible for the creation of the South Korean Republic. Our Nation gave encouragement to those people. Our Nation has allowed 21,000,000 people, who do not want communism, who want decency and democracy, and a nation who is willing to fight for its survival, to expect our assistance. They need our help. Now, are we going to let them down on the basis that their position is militarily indefensible? I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota that the good name of the United States is too important in the world today, because if we let Korea go down, what faith will anyone else in south Asia have in the word of the United States. If you expect India to have faith in us, if you expect Indonesia to have faith in us, or any other nation in southeast Asia to have faith in us, it is important that our commitments and our implied promises to Korea be kept.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. How far would the gentleman have us go in protecting Korea from the wolves of communism? To war?

Mr. RIBICOFF. I do not think that is the question at all that is involved today. We are concerned here with economic aid only. No one has asked for military intervention.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this legislation. This is a good opportunity for us to save about $300,000,000. There is no use for us to literally give this to Russia. Every competent military man says that South Korea will inevitably pass to North Korea and to Soviet Communist control.

We had better keep these millions here and apply them to our national debt which is increasing at the rate of $17,000,000 per day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. (a) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, the Administrator is authorized to make available to the Republic of Korea merchant vessels of tonnage not in excess of 2,500 gross tons each, in a number not to exceed 10 at any one time, with a stipulation that such vessels shall be operated only in east Asian waters and must be returned forthwith upon demand of the Administrator and in any event not later than June 30, 1951.

(b) Any agency of the United States Government owning or operating any such vessel is authorized to make such vessel available to the Administrator for the purposes of this section upon his application, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law and without reimbursement by the Administrator, and title to any such vessel so supplied shall remain in the United States Government.

SEC. 5. (a) In order to carry out the provisions of this act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1950, not to exceed $150,000,000.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, until such time as an appropriation shall be made pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to make advances not to exceed in the aggregate $50,000,000 to carry out the provisions of this act, in such manner, at such times, and in such amounts as the Administrator shall request, and no interest shall be charged on advances made by the Treasury to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for this purpose. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be repaid without interest for advances made by it hereunder, from funds made available for the purposes of this act.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEE: On page 3, line 14, strike out all of lines 14 through 25 and through line 4 on page 4, and insert in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 5. In order to carry out the provisions of this act, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President, in addition to sums already appropriated, not to exceed $60,000,000 for the period February 15, 1950 to June 30, 1950."

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment I stated would be offered, when I made my opening statement. I have no desire to speak further on the amendment.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to support this amendment, but do not kid yourself that this cuts the Korean aid program from $150,000,000 to $60,000,000. It cuts it to $120,000,000 for the first year, but the explanations that have been made to our committee do not reduce the total amount of the program, which you will find on pages 28 and 29 of the committee report.

This amendment also does not change section 2 of the bill, which has already been passed without amendment, which provides a permanent policy of continuing to assist the Republic of Korea.

When you vote for this bill, if you do, you will be voting a permanent policy which is estimated to cost $385,000 in the next 3 years and leave Korea, as long as the far eastern situation is the way it is now, still in the red to the tune of about $35,000,000 a year.

There is one other point I want to make. The words promise and commitment have crept into the debate now and then. I urge you to look at page 182 of the hearings, where Mr. Claxton, on behalf of the Secretary of State, said there was no promise, no commitment, no international treaty, no obligation involved. He said, "It is not as much as a promise."

In view of the fact that our present hearings have been so fragmentary, for reasons I have mentioned earlier, and in view of the fact that they are 6 months stale, and that a lot of water has gone over the dam in the Far East with reference to the movements of Russia and to the backward movements of the United States with respect to that half a billion people in northern Asia whom we have abandoned, all except this 21,000,000, I am going to offer a motion to recommit this bill to the Committee on Foreign Affairs for further study and hearing. I suggest that those of you who feel that maybe we had better take another look at this in view of what has happened, much of which we do not know about now, can carry out that idea by voting to recommit this bill to our committee for further study and hearings.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. If the bill is recommitted and further study is given to the matter, will that not give the Secretary of State an opportunity to revise his testimony which appears at page 47 of the record, where he said, "There is no assurance that the thing is going to be successful. There is complete assurance that Korea will go in 2 or 3 months, if you do not do this." Those statements were made in June of last year.

Mr. VORYS. That was his statement on June 23. There is no complete assurance that Korea will go in 2 or 3 months if this bill is not passed.

Now the Secretary of State can have an opportunity, if we have further hearings, to bring his prophecy up to date on this matter.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS. I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. In response to what the gentleman from New York just said about the possible collapse of South Korea if aid is not forthcoming, let me call his attention to the fact that Korea has been kept going because of appropriations which have been made since the end of the last fiscal year.

Furthermore, in response to the question raised by the gentleman from Ohio, I am sure the gentleman did not mean that there was any misapprehension on this side insofar as the amount needed this year is concerned to carry South Korea through. We have stated that $60,000,000 was already appropriated and obligated, and this additional $60,000,000, which will be put into the bill if this amendment is carried, means the total for this fiscal year will be $120,000,000.

Mr. VORYS. That is correct; under a program which was set before us very ably and intelligently by the ECA officials which will require $385,000,000 to bring Korea within $35,000,000 of balancing their dollar budget.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Unless Congress decrees otherwise.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that on page 1, line 3, the figure "1949" be changed to "1950."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. KEE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REDDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REDDEN: Page 4, after line 4, add the following new subsection:

"(c) At least one-half of the funds made available to carry out the provisions of this act (including funds advanced by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation but excluding appropriated funds used to repay such advances) shall be used to purchase from the Commodity Credit Corporation wheat, corn, tobacco, and cotton heretofore or hereafter acquired by the Corporation in the administration of its price-support programs, and such other surplus agricultural commodities so acquired as the Administrator determines can reasonably be used by the people of Korea, and to furnish the commodities so purchased to the Republic of Korea."

Mr. REDDEN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to require at least one-half of the money appropriated under this bill to be spent in the purchase of surplus agricultural commodities.

According to a report just issued by the Department of Agriculture, price-support operations in four commodities accounted for the bulk of the loan total. These commodities, the quantities of collateral pledged, and the loans outstanding, as of November 30, 1949, were as follows:

	Quantity	Amount
Wheat.....bushels..	299,369,674	$593,635,564
Corn.....do....	360,788,638	497,482,734
Cotton.....bales..	1,482,498	222,370,127
Tobacco.....pounds..	363,385,733	149,755,155
Other.....	.....	194,850,926
Total.....	.....	1,658,094,506

The warehouses available to the Production and Marketing Administration are overflowing with surplus farm commodities. In many instances, large surpluses against which loans have been granted, are still in storage on the farms. In some cases loans have been granted against grain piled high in the fields because the warehouses available and the storage places of the farmers were all insufficient to care for these surpluses.

The figures I have given you with respect to these four basic commodities represent the products now on hand, and which must be disposed of along with many other farm products if there is to be storage space for surplus commodities on the farms, or in the warehouses. And so the question arises, What are we to do with this great surplus which is fast accumulating and will soon be completely out of control?

One day the Congress will have to order it given away or dumped into the ocean. It is depreciating now to the extent that for the current fiscal year between June and October 1949, the Government sustained a loss of $43,958,000 in carrying out this program. The loss for one year prior to June 30, 1949, was $254,000,000.

In all surplus commodities as of November 30, 1949, the Department of Agriculture had invested $3,370,190,000 under the price-support program administered by the Production and Marketing Administration.

This is a staggering figure of surplus farm commodities in America. It will bring catastrophe to the farmer if allowed to continue. It will upset our entire economy, and something should be done about it before it is too late.

If this amendment is adopted and is carried through our entire foreign aid programs, it will remove approximately $3,000,000,000 worth of surplus agricultural commodities from the warehouses of the Production and Marketing Administration. The effect of such an operation would be twofold. First, it would remove a vast part of the surplus agricultural commodities from the warehouses, and prohibit them from being sold again on the open market in competition with the farm products of 1950. Second, it would reduce by approximately $3,000,000,000 a budget recently submitted by the President, because we would be authorizing the expenditure of surplus commodities rather than dollars.

Certain Members of the Senate have recently suggested that around $3,000,000,000 could be cut from the budget in various ways. If their program is added to the suggestion which would be possible by this amendment, we will have no trouble in balancing the budget, and I urge that this amendment be adopted forthwith.

Other commodities which are in surplus supply, against which loans have been made, aggregate $194,850,926.

The warehouses of this country, I understand, according to the Department of Agriculture, are completely bulging and overflowing with surplus farm commodities. We have invested in those commodities approximately $3,250,000,000, all of which are on hand, or were as of November 30, 1949.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REDDEN. I yield.

Mr. MILES. I feel this is a very worthy amendment. Should the amendment be adopted, I will vote for the bill. Otherwise, I would seriously consider voting against it.

Mr. REDDEN. I appreciate that from the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REDDEN. I yield.

Mr. GROSS. Our farmers in Iowa are getting 18 cents a dozen for their eggs.

Mr. REDDEN. I so understand.

Mr. GROSS. Is there anything in this amendment that would preclude shipping some of the 73,000,000 pounds of dried eggs to Korea?

Mr. REDDEN. Not at all. This includes any products of the farm that the Department of Agriculture or the Administrator of ECA say can reasonably be used by the people of Korea. So I contend that if this amendment is adopted it will have two effects: First, it will help to relieve the surplus agricultural commodities that are available in tremendous abundance everywhere in this country. Second, if this policy is followed in this bill and in all other foreign-aid programs that this Congress may adopt, it will possibly relieve appropriations by this Congress in a minimum of $3,000,000,000, because if we follow out the recommendations of the administration with respect to the ECA program for this year, we will appropriate around three and one-half billion or perhaps four billion. If half or two-thirds of that amount is spent for surplus commodities, then, instead of appropriating dollars, we will be appropriating surplus farm commodities.

So I hope this House may adopt the amendment, not only in order to help the people of Korea but to help the farmers of America who have filled all the warehouses, including their own, with surplus agricultural commodities.

I understand loans have been advanced by the Commodity Credit Corporation on grains that are lying out upon the soil now; that we have corn and wheat and rye and other farm products in such tremendous quantities that they cannot even find shelter for them. At least we might offer them to the people of Korea, since this appropriation is a gift.

I would like to say further that if cotton, tobacco, wheat, and corn in this country are removed from storage and across the waters to the people to whom we are going to give this money, it will save us someday from being called upon to send it out into the ocean and there dump it without any compensation. It reminds me of the story of a man that I talked to down home. I asked the fellow if he raised any rye that year. He said, "Raise rye? I raised so much rye on my farm this year until I had to rent my neighbor's farm to store it on." We are just about that way with surplus farm commodities in this country. We are going to have to find some other country to pile it upon or else send it to foreign countries under legislative enactment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment on its face seems to be a pretty good thing. I come from a tobacco, cotton, and corn country too. We are going to have a real problem of getting rid of our farm surpluses some day, but when we do have to give them away, we want them to do somebody some good.

As far as the Koreans are concerned, they do not need this stuff. It may be better to follow one of the alternative suggestions of the gentleman from North Carolina, the suggestion that if we do not send some of our surplus farm products to Korea it might be necessary to dump them in the Pacific Ocean. So far as benefit to all concerned, it might be better to dump them into the Pacific Ocean. Certainly they would not be of material benefit to the Koreans because they do not need them. If we dump this produce into the Pacific Ocean, then probably the fish would eat it and we could catch the fish and eat the fish at home and it would help a great many American taxpayers. Agricultural food products are not in short supply in Korea. The estimate of Korea's immediate needs does not include food, except $160,000 of vegetable oils and $630,000 for salt. I do not know whether we have any surplus salt in this country; maybe we have a little surplus vegetable oil.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDS. I yield.

Mr. KEE. We have reports from Korea that they are now in a situation where they can produce all the salt they want and more too.

Mr. RICHARDS. In Korea we have a country that can produce all of its own food; and, given some additional help, it can grow into a self-sustaining economic unit. A country that is self-sustaining usually has the will to defend itself. It is not easy to find peoples these days who are willing to sacrifice and fight for the democratic ideal. We do not find the will to sacrifice and fight in the hearts of everybody we are helping these days, but the evidence is uncontradicted that the will to fight is in the hearts of the Koreans. They have 100,000 soldiers ready to fight. They have turned back the Communists on their borders twice by force of arms. Korea is one of the few spots in Asia, Mr. Chairman, right now where we can depend on the people to fight to the limit. You have got something here, you have a people who believe in democracy, you have a people who have indicated a will to fight for democracy. The whole Pacific and Asiatic area is looking to the Congress of the United States today. We have promised the people of the world that we would help those who believe in democracy and who would fight for it. Now, having put our hand to the plow, are we going to turn back?

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDS. I yield.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman is not laboring under the impression that there are no hungry people in Korea, is he?

Mr. RICHARDS. No; there are some hungry people everywhere.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Should we not then do something for them by sending them surplus farm products?

Mr. RICHARDS. We are dealing here with the needs of Korea.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDS. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. If the gentleman will read the amendment he will find that it reads as follows:

> At least one-half shall be used for the purpose contained in the amendment.

That means that this is an amendment to cut this bill by 50 percent, period.

Mr. RICHARDS. By 50 percent?

Mr. JAVITS. That is exactly what the amendment states.

Mr. RICHARDS. It means that the Koreans will get but $30,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think the spirit of this amendment is good; I do not believe that it would work. The Chinese now have sufficient rice; in fact, last year they exported 100,000 metric tons and expect to export 200,000 metric tons this year. They use but little corn and wheat. I think they do want their cotton and tobacco. I doubt very much whether the amendment would be practicable, although I think the spirit of it is commendable.

Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that a motion to recommit this bill is going to be offered by the gentleman from Ohio. Inasmuch as the chairman of the committee has said there has been a change in the situation, that they do not need salt now—I note the hearings were held in June of last year—that is another reason for recommitting this bill to see if we can get a little more information. Perhaps they do not need all of this vegetable oil. We were told that they are doing pretty well on coal and that the electric-light situation has improved a great deal since this report was written.

My object in coming again to the well of the House is this: the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DEANE], made the statement that there apparently is some difference of opinion between the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL], and myself with reference to our visit in Korea. There is no difference of opinion in our committee, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DEANE] has stated on the floor of the House. I think the Members of Congress ought to have this report, which is now in the hands of the Appropriations Committee. I hope it will be made a public document shortly. I quote from it as follows:

> For example, South Korea needs fertilizer plants and other facilities, but the wisdom of our aiding them to build industrial facilities, unless the United States is entrenched in the Far East sufficiently to buttress South Korea, is open to question. We certainly do not want to be party to developing ready-made industrial capacity and other capital improvements to fall into the hands of the Communists if they should take the country. At least we ought to go slow in this respect until the situation is clarified.

This report was signed by the four members of the committee who visited that area.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, may I say that we endorse the request of the Korean Government, as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations appointed to visit Korea in order to obtain certain information for our committee. We have made our report to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], chairman of our House Appropriations Committee. We did say in our report that we doubted the wisdom of constructing permanent projects until the matter of our foreign policy could be ironed out and settled in the Far East. This, however, is a matter that the Appropriations Committee can handle. I am sure that serious consideration shall be given to this matter. The bill, after the amendments that we have adopted, should be passed.

Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, we were placed in Korea at the surrender conference of Japan. The American flag was placed there, and I am not willing to retreat. We have always enjoyed the friendship of the Korean people. They are a fine and noble people. We have assisted them in establishing their Government. The Government is young although their nation is old in years of existence. The seeds of democracy have been planted and I hope in the years to come the Republic of Korea shall be a strong democratic nation. This bill should be passed. The request of Korea has been reduced. This was done by the Republic of Korea. They reduced their request $30,000,000. We have already given them $60,000,000, and this constitutes the reason for reducing the amount of the pending bill to $60,000,000. I hope this bill as amended will pass.

Mr. KRUSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the committee that went to Korea, along with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL], and I endorse what he just said about the particular legislation now before us. I agree that in our consideration of Korea we certainly have to consider it in its relation to the whole picture in the Far East. We do feel that possibly our whole policy, insofar as the Far East situation is concerned, needs to be clarified in some respects.

I would like to say this so far as my personal observation of the Korean people is concerned. I have never been more impressed with a group of people and their determination and their willingness to sacrifice their lives, if necessary, in behalf of what they believe is right and for the kind of government they wish to have. Korea has had a turbulent history of some 4,000 years. During the 40-year domination by the Japanese, which has just recently ended, I would like to point out the fact that the Korean people had a government in exile, and they never lost their determination to establish a free, independent, democratic government. I think the circumstances warrant our supporting this legislation at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. REDDEN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. REDDEN) there were—ayes 55, noes 95.

Mr. REDDEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JAVITS: On page 3 after section number 5 insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 6. The authorization for appropriations in this act is limited to the period ending June 30, 1950, in order that any subsequent authorizations may be separately passed on, and is not to be construed as an express or implied commitment to provide further authorizations or appropriations."

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the page reference contained in the amendment be made to read page 4 instead of page 3.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to answer the statements which have been made here and which are not grounded upon the record, that this is a commitment by the Congress to engage in a $380,000,000 recovery program for Korea. The idea with which the committee reported this bill to the floor was that it meant exactly what the bill said; that it was an appropriation limited by the date which is contained in the bill itself, June 30, 1950. It was confined to this particular amount, $60,000,000, and that thereafter the committes of Congress and the Congress itself could determine whether the situation warranted going on further. That is borne out by the record to which my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] referred, when he read the statement of Mr. Claxton, but he did not read it all. Mr. Claxton said as follows: "It is not as much as a promise." That is what the gentleman from Ohio read.

Then he goes on:

We have made numerous declarations as to our intention with the Government of Korea. It was a question simply of whether the United States was going to carry through on its declarations as distinguished from carrying through on a commitment or obligation.

In other words, this has been declared to be the policy with respect to the United States, subject—and I underline the word "subject"—to what the Congress may do about furnishing money.

The Congress by the amendment which I have just proposed makes it crystal clear that it is going along with the policy only to the extent authorized by this act, to wit, to June 30, 1950, for the amount of money which is specified in the act, $60,000,000. With that, no one can say we are writing a blank check or a check for more than the exact amount stated, $60,000,000.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Therefore, do I understand the gentleman correctly that this statement by Mr. Claxton of the State Department as to a declaration by the State Department is the one thing in the nature of a commitment to which the gentleman referred in his remarks in the general debate?

Mr. JAVITS. Exactly.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman would recognize, would he not, that the use of the word "commitment" is a rather strong phrase to use under these circumstances?

Mr. JAVITS. I grant it is inappropriate.

Mr. JACKSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. JACKSON of California. I believe the gentleman has an excellent amendment, inasmuch as it will serve to clear up any consideration of commitment and will make it, as the gentleman said, crystal clear that future decisions with respect to Korean aid will largely rest within this body.

Mr. JAVITS. May I say in all fairness, Mr. Chairman, that I have consulted the chairman of the committee, and I think most of the members of the committee favor this bill and may favor this amendment.

I should like to make one other point before completing my remarks about this amendment, and that is to answer briefly the question which has been asked about this bill. I quote this question:

What kind of a policy for the Far East could be based on Korea, and is our national security involved in Korea?

I think we all must understand and we all must believe that our national security is involved in the people of Asia, that the policy for the Far East which we must build must be built upon the people of Asia, and that this bill designs to preserve for our cause, the cause of democracy and freedom, the 21,000,000 people of Asia who reside in Korea.

Mr. KEE. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is not necessary, but in view of the fact that it is absolutely impossible for one Congress to bind a succeeding Congress, and that this amendment merely states what is true, anyway. that a succeeding Congress can always review what has taken place in a preceding Congress, I am willing to accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BONNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5330) to promote world peace and the general welfare, national interest, and foreign policy of the United States by providing aid to the Republic of Korea, pursuant to House Resolution 368, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. VORYS. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman qualifies. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. VORYS moves to recommit H. R. 5330 to the Committee on Foreign Affairs for further study and hearings.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VORYS) there were—ayes 89, noes 112.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken and there were—yeas 190, nays 194, not voting 47, as follows:

SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been granted a special order to address the House for 15 minutes today. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include certain excerpts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

TAPS SOUND FOR BATTLESHIP "OREGON"

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, heretofore on several occasions I have called attention in the House to the sad plight of the U. S. S. Oregon, the old battleship which performed such heroic service in the Spanish-American War. The final chapter in the history of this famous battleship seems now to have been written.

After the ship was decommissioned by reason of age and obsolescence it was turned over to the State of Oregon and from June 1925 to October 1942 the State of Oregon had possession and custody of the ship, which was maintained as a shrine and historical monument to instill in the hearts and minds of our people, and particularly the boys and girls, patriotism and love of country. However, December 7, 1942, the old battlewagon was repossessed by the United States Navy and in February 1943 was sold to be junked, against the wishes of thousands of Oregon residents whose affection for the battleship led them to believe that it would be of far greater value to the Nation to maintain the ship as a shrine than to junk it for the small amount of salvage it contained.

It may be of interest to future generations to recite here some of the history of this famous battleship. The battleship Oregon was constructed pursuant to an act of Congress June 30, 1890, at a cost of $6,280,000, and was launched October 26, 1893. Capt. Charles Edgar Clark was in command when the historic ship made its famous run around South America, through the Straits of Magellan, on to Key West, and then to Santiago, to take part in the destruction of the Spanish fleet on July 3, 1898.

As detailed in the Oregon Journal of Sunday, December 7, 1947, on March 18, 1898, the Oregon sailed from what had been her home port and where she had been christened to steam away on a renowned cruise.

The Oregon covered a distance of 14,500 miles from Bremerton, Wash., to Jupiter Inlet, Fla., using 4,000 tons of coal and maintaining an average speed off 11.6 knots per hour.

She reached Santiago on the morning of June 1.

On the Sunday morning of July 3, the ships lay at anchor in waters as calm as an inland lake. Officers and men alike, clad in spotless white, were ready for the general muster to listen to the reading of the Articles of War, a customary rule in the Navy on the first Sunday of every month.

Suddenly there was a clanging of gongs and men and officers alike rushed for their stations.

Shouts and cheers rang out. "There they are. There they are." Caps were waved and shouts rose higher as the Maria Theresa, one of the most powerful battleships in the world at that time, led the Spanish fleet through the narrow channel and swept majestically from the harbor of Santiago.

Cervera's fleet was making for the open sea when Commodore Schley, on the Brooklyn, ordered the Atlantic squadron to close in. The first ship had scarcely cleared the harbor when a shot was made from one of the Oregon's 6-pounders, fired by Private O'Shay, of the gun crew.

The Oregon had been ready and waiting for this time to come. Chief Engineer Milligan had sufficient steam up to give the vessel a speed of 10 knots, while the other ships started from 5 or 6.

Full speed ahead went the old Oregon. She ranged up near the Maria Theresa which was already afire from bursting shells of the Indiana and Iowa, and raked the Spanish ship until she ran ashore on the rocks, 6 miles from Santiago.

Then the Oregon charged after the Almirante Oquindo, which beached in a mass of flames 10 minutes after the Spanish flagship had run on the rocks.

By now the Oregon had worked her speed up to 16 knots, and when about 3,000 yards from the Viscaya, which had swung offshore and headed across the Oregon's bow, launched a furious broadside. On fire, she, too, headed for shore 10 miles from Morro Castle.

Commodore Schley, of the Brooklyn, signaled, "Oregon, well done." The only one of the Spanish fleet that had escaped from the harbor was the Colon. The Brooklyn and Oregon shortened the 6-mile lead in short order. From the Oregon's 13-pounder, shells struck under the Colon's stern, and the last shot of July 3 had been fired.

The commander of the Colon dropped her colors at the foot of the flagstaff. A boat from the Brooklyn was sent, under cover of the guns of the Oregon, to receive the surrender of the Colon. Bugles sounded "Cease firing."

The thunder of the heavy guns stopped. The band on the deck played the Star-Spangled Banner and followed it by There's a Hot Time.

The crew of the Oregon, 500 strong, bare to the waist, begrimed with powder and coal dust, danced and cheered with joy. They cheered their captain rousingly. The Brooklyn signaled, "Congratulations upon a glorious victory."

On the following morning the Oregon sailed back over the route of the victory to see what was left of the pride and glory of Spain piled in burning wreckage for miles along the Cuban coast.

The reception given on the Fourth of July to the Oregon will never be forgotten. Commodore Schley's greeting signal of "Welcome back, brave Oregon," will be remembered as long as there is a history to record the events of those days.

The citizens of our Nation and particularly the State of Oregon are proud of this heroic achievement of the battleship Oregon. When the time arrived for retiring the Oregon from active service in the Navy, possession was turned over to the State of Oregon, and from June 1925 to October 1942 the State had possession and custody under the memorandum receipt executed to the Secretary of the Navy by the Battleship Oregon Commission, an agency of the State. Title, however, remained in the United States. The Oregon was moored in a historic park on the banks of the Willamette River, within the corporate limits of the city of Portland, where it was maintained by the people of Oregon as a historic shrine in commemoration of heroic achievement in defense of our country.

The biennial reports of the secretary of state for Oregon show that from 1927 to June 1941 the State appropriated $154,961.14 for the care and maintenance of the ship, under the supervision of the Battleship Oregon Commission, the members of which served without compensation or other allowance. During this period these appropriations by the State, together with appropriations by the port of Portland, the city of Portland, public subscriptions, and contribution from the United States made possible providing a permanent anchorage for the Oregon in the historic park to which I have referred, which was dedicated and improved with the assistance of the Work Projects Administration and was known as the Battleship Oregon Marine Park.

The Oregon as maintained by the commission was not only a relic of great historic and patriotic interest but was maintained as a museum for the preservation and display of historic objects having reference to the old battleship. The gun deck also served as a meeting place for Boy Scouts, Sea Scouts, Boy Rangers, Girl Scouts, Campfire Girls, Girl Mariners, and various other civic, patriotic, and character-building organizations, particularly having to do with the youth of our Nation. There was an average monthly attendance of 6,000 visitors to the ship, composed largely of school children and other organizations. The old ship, by reason of its heroic achievements in the Spanish-American War and its glorious history as a fighting battle wagon in the American Navy and its maintenance through the years by the State of Oregon as a symbol of patriotism to our country had enshrined itself in the hearts of the people of Oregon to such an extent that it had become an invaluable factor in all patriotic endeavors engaged in my our State particularly in time of war. In passing I may say there can be little question that the value of the ship for war purposes as a historic shrine in building morale and patriotism in our people far exceeded the nominal value of the material involved for purely salvage purposes.

On October 12, 1942, the Navy Department, with the approval of the President, as contended in order to meet the exigencies of the war occasioned by the shortage of scrap metals, ordered the vessel scrapped, and these operations began on about December 8, 1942. I was in Portland in my district at the time, and I sent a telegram to the officials in charge of the dismantling of ship reading as follows:

Oregon cooperating 100 percent in war effort. Willing to sacrifice old Oregon battleship so near to our hearts that the old ship may again in a new form perform gallantly as she did in her memorable fight. We hope you will see that the ship be not sold to dealers but may go through to war needs without profit to anyone. Please advise if this can be done.

In reply to this telegram, on October 24, 1942, I received a letter from R. W. Berry, commander, United States Navy, deputy Director in the Office of Public Relations, Navy Department, reading as follows:

As our official news release indicated, the U. S. S. Oregon is to be dismantled under the strict supervision of the War Production Board and the Navy Department.

I am advised, however, by the Salvage Construction Section of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, that it cannot be guaranteed to have the ship wrecked without profit to anyone.

The only way she can be dismantled is by a qualified wrecker. The project is an enormous one. It is regarded as being next to impossible to obtain the services of a wrecker who will do this job without profit and for sentiment only. Unless you, or perhaps someone else, knows of a person or a company on the west coast who will warrant to wreck the Oregon without profit, there is no alternative to proceeding as contemplated.

Please be assured that your feelings about the Oregon are fully appreciated. Every effort will be exerted by all concerned to wreck her in accordance with the spirit of your wishes.

Mr. Speaker, after the dismantling of the battleship Oregon was presumed to have been completed I asked for the report on the salvage operations and the disposition of the salvage material and the payment received by the Federal Government therefor, and the contribution to the war effort of the scrapping of the battleship.

On April 19, 1944, I urged the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the House to make an investigation and report on the salvaging operations, without avail. However, I continued my investigations and inquiries and at last have received from the Secretary of the Navy and the Maritime Commission reports purporting to show the results of the salvaging operations and all of the funds received by the Federal Government therefor and the disposition of the salvage material.

As shown by this report the ship was turned over to Edward M. Ricker & Co., on a purchase price of $35,000. The total amount received from sales of the salvage material by the Edward M. Ricker & Co. as shown by the reports to me amount to $189,629.35 against which the allowable costs and expenses of the contractor to that time, including the purchase price of the ship of $35,000 was $161,811.03. After the hull of the ship was requisitioned by the Navy, the Maritime Commission determined on April 13, 1948, that $10,250 was just compensation for title to the hull that had been requisitioned by the United States and that $1,020.80 was just compensation for delay in payment. These amounts were unsatisfactory to Edward M. Ricker & Co., whereupon the Maritime Commission paid to the Company 75 percent of these amounts, namely $7,687.50 plus $765.60, in June of 1949, reserving to the owner the right to sue the United States to collect an additional amount. The Maritime Commission advised me on January 16, 1950, that they had received no notice of the filing of any action for this collection.

These reports, to me, disclose that the War Shipping Administration repossessed from Edward M. Ricker & Co., salvage material for which they paid the company $93,278.63 which, together with the amounts paid by the Maritime Commission on account of payment for the hull of the battleship, namely $8,453.10, makes a total aggregate of $101,731.73 paid to Edward M. Ricker & Co. by Government agencies for salvage material from the battleship. In other words, the United States Government disposed of the ship for $35,000 but paid back to the purchaser $101,731.73 for purchases of a portion of the salvage material from the ship and is still subject to a suit for additional amounts claimed by the company as payment for the hull taken over by the Government.

I include as a part of these remarks correspondence received by me which will show in detail the entire transaction:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, August 17, 1949.

Hon. HOMER D. ANGELL,
Congress of the United States,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ANGELL: In my letter of July 15, 1949, I advised you that I would take steps to assemble certain information concerning the Oregon, desired by you, and would forward it when it had been compiled.

As you are aware, the Department of the Navy was most reluctant to scrap this ship. On numerous occasions it expressed the belief that the ship could best serve the interests of the country by remaining a relic. For example, Mr. Forrestal, in his letter to Mr. Paul C. Cabot, Deputy Director of the Conservation Division of the War Production Board, stated on August 6, 1942:

"The great need of all available metal for use in the war effort is realized. However, it is considered that memorials such as the battleship Oregon constitute a distinct morale factor and should be preserved until all other sources of material have been exhausted."

On September 7, 1942, Mr. Bard stated to the commander of Marin-Sonoma County Council, VFW of San Rafael, Calif.:

"It is, therefore, the present intention of the Navy Department to retain the Oregon on the Navy list to remain in the possession of the State of Oregon under a loan status."

On July 22, 1942, Mr. Forrestal wrote the Governor of Oregon as follows:

"Your letter of July 16, 1942, enclosing correspondence with Mr. C. W. Wendle, of the War Production Board, in regard to the use of the battleship Oregon as salvage material, is greatly appreciated.

"Your answer to Mr. Wendle regarding the status of the Oregon was correct. The vessel can be disposed of only by the Navy Department and by that agency only in accordance with the existing laws concerning the disposition of naval vessels.

"The action of the Seattle office of the War Production Board was taken without the knowledge of the Navy Department.

"The great need of all available metal for use in the war effort is realized. However, it is considered that memorials, such as the battleship Oregon, representing in their being the spirit and traditions of the Navy and of the country it represents, constitute a distinct morale factor and should be preserved until all other sources of material have been exhausted."

Other examples could be cited.

The scrapping of the Oregon was directed by the President on October 26, 1942. The ship was sold to the Edw. M. Ricker & Co., of Portland, Oreg., for scrapping, and the contract provided that the removal of material would be under the direction or approval of the War Production Board and/or the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts in the Navy Department.

In the spring of 1944 an operational use developed for the hull of the ship, which had not been scrapped, and on April 11, 1944, the War Shipping Administration directed that the hull be requisitioned for the Navy, pursuant to section 902 of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, as amended. The ship was delivered to the Navy by the War Shipping Administration on April 19, 1944, and was subsequently fitted for use in the Pacific campaigns, and was so used.

As requested by you, there is forwarded herewith a list of materials removed from the ship up to the time it was requisitioned by the War Shipping Administration, together with its value and disposition.

At the time the ship was requisitioned a cost inspection was made covering the execution of the contract by the scrapping company. This inspection indicated that the contractor, to that time, had received from sales of material the amount of $189,629.35, and the allowable costs and expenses of the contractor to that time (including the purchase price of the ship of $35,000) was $161,811.03.

Section 902 of the Merchant Marine Act of June 29, 1936 (46 U. S. C. 1242), under which the Oregon was requisitioned from the scrapping contractor for use in the Pacific, places the determination of compensation for the seizure in the hands of the Maritime Commission. It is understood that this determination has not been finally made, and, accordingly, any fiscal data subsequent to the cost inspection made at the time the ship was requisitioned is not available. I suggest that inquiries in regard to this settlement with the wrecker be addressed to the Maritime Commission.

I trust the above information adequately answers the request for information contained in your letter of July 7.

Sincerely yours,

DAN A. KIMBALL,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

UNITED STATES MARITIME COMMISSION,
Washington, January 16, 1950.

The Honorable HOMER D. ANGELL,
Member of Congress,
House of Representatives.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ANGELL: This is in reply to your inquiry of January 10, 1950, about payment for title to the vessel (former battleship) Oregon, which was requisitioned on April 19, 1944.

On April 13, 1948, the Maritime Commission determined that $10,250 was just compensation for title to the vessel and that $1,020.80 was compensation for delay in payment. Those amounts were unsatisfactory to Edward M. Ricker & Co., the owner, so 75 percent of those amounts ($7,687.50 plus $765.60) was paid to the owner late in June 1949, reserving to the owner the right to sue to collect an additional amount.

We have not received notice of the filing of any action for this collection.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES D. MARSHALL,
General Manager.

SENATE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 20, 1950

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 4, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God eternal, immortal, invisible, we would hush our busy thoughts to silence as we wait for Thy word. If we listen only to the clamor of the world without, we lose our way, our purpose, our peace, and our poise.

Override the errors of our faulty judgments. Through the sincere expression of differing appraisals may the final wisdom that charts the Nation's course in these perilous days be higher than our own. Make our America more and more the hope of all who suffer and the dread of all who plot iniquity. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.
